The Gowns at the Greenway

If blue ribbons were awarded for the best displays at the Greenway ball, they would probably be distributed as follows: For the most original gown, Mrs. Fred McNear; for the most beautiful gown, Mrs. Frederick Kohl; for the most elaborate jewelry, Mrs. George A. Pope; for the most artistic gown, Mrs. Joseph D. Grant; for the quaintest gown, Miss Sallie Maynard; for the most distinguished appearing grande dame, Mrs. Uriel Sebree. In the debutante class it was conceded that the gown worn by Miss Vera De Sabla was the most satisfactory from the artistic viewpoint. Honors among the last year buds were even between Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick, Miss Elizabeth Newhall and Miss Harriet

MISS HAZEL WILCOX

Prominent among the motorists of Detroit. She operates her Ford Coupe as well as the most expert chauffeur in the city of motor factories.

Alexander, the latter having a little the best of it, many thought, by reason of the frock she wore, a chiffon bordered with bright red roses. Miss De Sabla's dress was the simplest in construction, though the trimming was no everyday affair. The skirt was full, with a train of white net over satin, seed pearls and crystals forming a border of small flowers about the hem. Mrs. Sebree, wife of Admiral Sebree, was under the especial care of Henry T. Scott for most of the evening. Mr. Scott has the reputation of being a judge of beauty of the rare type. The verdict was justified in Mrs. Sebree. Her dress was probably the plainest in all that suberb revue of fashion, but even so, she was easily the most regal woman at the ball, carrying herself with the air of a queen blithely secure of her throne. Her dress was an old rose satin, heavy and supple, the skirt a circular one with a sweeping train. The bodice was a surplice made of satin and dull silver lace, crossed over simply. There isn't a woman in ten thousand who would have the courage to wear her hair as Mrs. Sebree does. It was drawn back loosely, parted in the middle, and coiled into a loose knot, giving an effect exactly like the head of the de Milo Venus. It was free from artificial curling. Mrs. Sebree is one of the very few women of any pretentions to fashion who have disdained consistently to have anything to do with hair upholstering and amid the jewel-bedecked, tiara-covered, puffed, becurled heads of the beauties the other night, with their accessories of borrowed braids and curls, Mrs. Sebree's satiny black hair, in its beautiful unadornment, was as refreshing a sight as one could imagine.

She Takes the Bare Foot Cure

A certain clever handsome woman now making her home at the Fairmont goes in for the barefoot cult that she learned over at a German spa last summer while trying to ward off a threatened attack of nervous prostration. She takes ten mile jaunts along the wet sands of the beach twice a week, walking from the Cliff House way beyond the first promontory and back again. None of her friends are in the secret, but all the women are consumed with curiosity to know what has wrought the transformation not only in her complexion and her figure but also in her spirits, for she is now as happy and gay as a high school miss with her first beau and says that she has learned what was meant by the ancient truism that heaven is within you. She is lithe, rosy cheeked, bright-eyed and merry spirited, and laughs at the poor deluded women who invest in rubber straight-

The tapestry room of Hotel Manx has been the scene of many pretty little dinners, luncheons and receptions during the past month and arrangements have been made for quite a few more during the season. Since Manager Larm made extensive improvements in the public rooms of the Manx the Tapestry Room has been very popular for afternoon teas and is well patronized by San Franciscans who happen to be in the shopping district late in the afternoon or after the matinee.

Tennis as a Beautifier

The flitting roses that come and go on the smooth cheeks of some of the society belles that one sees in town since the closing up of the country resorts, are by no means the accidental graces which indulgent nature bestows. There isn't anyone in town, not even a trench digger, who works harder for his day's wages than do these girls for their complexions. The older women attempt a short cut via the Turkish baths, but the younger set goes in for tennis and other athletics, and there isn't a better "sure-thing" beautifier known than a morning in the fog as one biffs the fleet tennis ball or makes the course over the links. Tennis is being revived in favor these days, and any morning one may see a bevy of the young brides and their girl friends at Alta Plaza, playing tennis for dear life. Among the enthusiasts are Mrs. Covington Pringle, Mrs. Russell Bogue, Mrs. Worthington Ames, and among the girls those who are particularly proficient are Miss Merritt Reid, Miss Josephine Hannigan, Miss Gertrude Ballard, Miss Edith Treaner and Miss Ethel McAllister.

The Latest English Game

Word comes to me from London that the blase fashionables of the country houses have discovered a new diversion for the temporary routing of ennui. The game is known as "bombarding" and consists simply in breaking into a fortified residence by violence or trickery. The rules of the game are of the simplest and possess the charm that any or all of them can be broken. When it is agreed between neighboring house parties to bombard one party endeavors to obtain entry into the house of the other. To the individual who is first in go the honors of war. At one country house where bombarding has been carried practically as far as enterprise and audacity will take it a great coup was made recently. Every device on the part of the storming force had been frustrated, when a telegraph boy rode up on a bicycle and delivered a message. So unintelligible was it that the bombarded host sent for the boy to come in to him and be questioned. Then only did he realize that he was lost, for the enemy stood before him radiantly triumphant in her becoming disguise of a post office boy. On another occasion the attack on a somewhat staid household was led by two determined young sportswomen. They crawled through two fields of turnips, to the amazement of farm workers. Then they scaled sundry walls and rushed into the house by an unused entrance, very miry and torn but victorious, just as the household were about to sit down to dinner. On a third occasion the attacker adopted the method of Cleopatra and came into the house in a roll of linoleum. The game has great possibilities of development in this country, for of course the unimaginative and rather slow Britons have not by any means exhausted its delights. I look to the exuberant spirits of Burlingame, always fascinated by British novelties, to take it up and demonstrate what Americans can do in the way of "bombarding."

In the Social Spotlight

The wedding of Miss Mattie Milton, daughter of Captain and Mrs. John B. Milton, U. S. N., and Ensign George Neal, U. S. N., will take place within a few weeks. It will be quietly celebrated on board the "Independence," Mare Island.

An engagement which will come as a surprise to their many friends on both sides of the bay is that of Edington Detrick Jr. and Mrs. William T. Dalby of Berkeley. Mr. Detrick is the well known insurance broker and is a widower with three children. Mrs. Dalby has two young children.

The introducing, by the Bismarck Cafe, of a new Hungarian Orchestra of ten pieces under the leadership of Herr Ferdinand Stark has given San Francisco music lovers an endless feast of good music. "Cingara," or gypsy music, is becoming very popular with the public in this country recently and such an orchestra when under the leadership of our own Stark is really a treat for any one to hear.

What Is a Soul Kiss?

By Edward F. O'Day

Being no expert in the sugary science of philematology I must perforce ask myself this rather embarrassing question and hie me forth in quest of a plausible answer. And being but a bashful bachelor of some few arts, not including that which Ovid loved to sing, I am impelled toward books for the resolution of my blushing and stammering doubts. True, I might seek counsel of a ghostly sort, misled by the spiritual seeming of that word "soul," but I fear the priest would tell me that palm to palm is holy palmer's kiss and the nun, that a pax vobiscum whispered in the gloom of the cloister with eyes downcast and folded arms is the true salutation of the soul. I realize, however, that the bilabial communion to which the name of soul kiss has been attached may not be interpreted in terms of religious definition and that the explanation of this contact of lips in linked sweetness long drawn out must be sought in profaner regions. Let me look then to the poets to shed a rosy light of love on the path where now my feet hesitate in darkness visible. What say the eternal expounders of the mystery of life on this subject of the soul kiss? At once I am enmeshed in the silken web of pleasing yet difficult phrases. I find myself at the couch of the dead Calypso and hearken to the soul-searing cult taught by liberal kisses; I gaze on the chalice of love formed by a sensuous mouth with lips ripe as the rapturing grape, rich as the rose in its redness and I learn of wet mingling mouths that crush a voluptuous vintage. I go with Verlaine to a squalid lodging where the poet and Esther play on willing lips a fiery accompaniment of the lovely songs which love sings in a burning heart. I breathe with Tannhauser the hot atmosphere of the Horsel and see his mouth charred with the kisses of Venus, whose lips cling hard till the kissed face has grown of one same fire and color with their own. I stray in the garden of Proserpine glimpsing one between whose lips the kiss becomes as fire and frankincense and the lips of these lovers are intertwisted and bitten till the foam has a savor of blood and the kiss lies on them like a flame. And I glide in a gondola while She sings the moth's kiss—as if you made believe you were not sure, this eve, how my face, your flower, had pursed its petals up; so, here and there you brush it, till I grow aware who wants me, and wide open burst—and She sings the bee's kiss—as if you entered gay my heart at some noonday, a bud that dares not disallow the claim, so all is rendered up, and passively its shattered cup over your head to sleep I bow—and the kiss of death—heart to heart and lips to lips, before The Three stabbed. If this of which these poets discourse be indeed the soul kiss, then am I at the alpha of enlightenment. Was it then the soul kiss that Guinevere pressed upon the lips of Lancelot, reading of which, so rapturously kissed by one so deep in love, the gentle Paolo pressed the virginal lips of Francesca, the book and writer both being love's purveyors, so that in its leaves that day no more they read? Was it the soul kiss that sealed the lips and the fates of Helen and Paris and launched a thousand ships and burnt the topless towers of Ilium? Was it the soul kiss that awakened the sleeping princess to the arms of the fairy prince? Was it the soul kiss that doomed the houses of Capulet and Montagu? Methinks I am beginning to sense this intricate matter. I understand now why Socrates wrote that a kiss may be powerful and dangerous. I grasp now the meaning of Apuleius who tells that when Venus lost her son she made proclamation by Mercury that he who could bring tidings of him should have seven kisses, a noble reward, we are told, better than so many golden talents, more precious than seven cities, nay, than so many provinces. I can believe now what Secundus says, that one kiss from that goddess would recover a dying man. 'Tis of the soul kiss these learned paynims wrote. This must have been the kiss which Aretine's Lucretia lavished on her reluctant suitor. And old Balthasar Castilio described the very thing, did he not? when he said: "They breathe out their souls and spirits together with their kisses, change hearts and spirits, and mingle affections as they do kisses, and it is rather a commingling of the mind than of the body." Why, if this be so, did prosaic old Xenophon write that it is the poison of a spider and a strong assault that conquers captains? Why did Catullus sing that it could be more bitter than black hellebore? And stern Scottish Buchanan, why did he call it destructive? I prefer the suave terms in which Apollonius tells how Jason soul-kissed Medea and if it were not a soul-kiss with which the soldier in that notable tale of Petronius wooed the widow of Ephesus, I am still struggling in the primer of this mysterious lore. I must confess that I would still be a backward scholar if I had not these authorities to unriddle my perplexity and were compelled to rely upon the play which takes its name from this most interesting lip-service for information as to the meaning of the soul-kiss. "The Soul Kiss" contained nothing worthy the name, if I am an apt critic of the abstruse science which I have just been investigating. After having exhausted my bookish authorities for points and comparisons, I asked the man who winds the ferry clock what he thought of the soul kisses exhibited at the Garrick Theatre. And with characteristic terseness he responded, "Oh hell!"

Dr. Wuellner's Lieder Singing

A physical giant with a head that suggests Beethoven's in its massive lines, its broad brow and its mop of hair and a dapper little gentleman exhibiting the last polish of dress and manner—these were the two that held a houseful of music lovers spell-bound on Tuesday night. It was a memorable occasion in the musical annals of the town for it was the first concert of Dr. Ludwig Wuellner and Coenraad V. Bos. Happily, the importance of the affair was duly appreciated, for an unusually large audience was assembled in the Novelty Theatre. That it was an enthusiastic audience goes without saying, for it was full of men and women with whom music is either a career or a passion and with such people enthusiasm for Dr. Wuellner was inevitable. We had heard much of Dr. Wuellner's voice and of his methods—how his vocal instrument lacked the sensuous quality and how he used as aids to the delivery of a song, not only variety of tone-coloring but also the mobility of a peculiarly sensitive countenance and suggestive alterations in the pose of the shoulders, arms and hands. These characteristics have excited controversy, but when Dr. Wuellner casts his spell over an audience, the controversial spirit is put to flight and his hearers are forced to admit that being a poet and an actor in addition to a singer, he is within his rights in summoning to the interpretation of song whatever aids his unerring taste recommends. Dr. Wuellner's first concert program contained twenty songs by Schubert, Brahms, Schumann, Richard Strauss and Hugo Wolff. For these songs the singer and his accompanist supplied a perfect setting. Imagine a flawless poem like Heine's Doppelganger set to music by a master, played by a master and sung by a master. That was not imagination but a beautiful reality for those who attended the concert. In this and in the other songs distinguished for dramatic poignancy, Dr. Wuellner was at his best; in The Erl-King, the Brahms-Lemcke "Verrat," The Song of the Stonecutters, The Soldier and The Two Grenadiers of Schumann. This last song Dr. Wuellner reserved for the conclusion of his program and threw into it such intensity of feeling and expression that his hearers were breathless and loth to depart. Not to hear him is to miss not only a great musical event but an opportunity to learn the final significance of ballads which are part of the world's most cherished poetical treasures.

—The Music Lover.

An Irreverend Musical Critic

I am afraid that at least one musical critic of New York does not exhibit the profound and abiding seriousness in relation to his work which is one of the prettiest traits of our local criticasters. This metropolitan appraiser of harmonic endeavor actually relaxes at intervals and indulges in jest and quip and merry banter when he is treating subjects which our local musical writers only approach with ceremonious kow-tow and elongated visage. I refer to Mr. W. J. Henderson, the musical critic of the New York Sun. Henderson is not invariably serious and impressed; he dares tackle grand opera in a spirit of levity—a profanation of art which, I need not remind my readers, would be impossible to the solemn frowning-faced word-painters of our local press. Henderson was moved to scandalous frivolity by the opening of the Hammerstein musical season in New York. With tongue in cheek and eye knowingly shut he remarks that nobody could say that "opera is not an elevating and ennobling form of public entertainment." He proceeds to develop this thesis with shocking disregard for the traditions of grand opera by reference to "the scarlet opera ladies" with whose incarnadined careers the music lovers of the metropolis were regaled. For the "Herodiade" of Massenet he shows the scantest respect. Imagine a local critic writing thus: "It is indeed an instructive tale, showing that it is a wise child that knows its own mother; that a prophet may be without honor in any old country, no matter how old; that uneasy lies the head that wears a tetrarch's crown, and that Jules Massenet, whose version of the fall of Adam was the ancient one of seduction by the woman, loved to harp on a string of a thousand lies." For Violetta in "Traviata" Henderson has even shabbier treatment, branding her a pink instead of a scarlet lady. But Thais he regards as "a real red one" and in connection with the opera of "Sapho" he has this to say: "Let us hope that since Sapho has been made an honest woman by being set to music and sung in French the innocent youths and maidens will 'spurn not the choral dance.'" I think none will gainsay that no San Francisco musical critic would handle these compositions in this ungloved fashion. To them art carries a message of soul-convulsing import and they would no more poke fun at "Herodiade" or "Thais" or "Sapho" than they would speak disrespectfully of the equator.

Cohan in "The Yankee Prince"

George Cohan will come to the Van Ness on Monday night, November 29, in a new musical play of his own composition called "The Yankee Prince," bringing with him his sister and the other members of his family in a company of one hundred. We are promised good music, competent support and a lively and good looking chorus. The particularly original character in the new piece is a manager of prize fights enacted by Tom Lewis with great skill. The final performance of "The Talk of New York" will be witnessed on Sunday night by Cohan and company who will arrive during the day.

Clyde Fitch's Last Play at the Valencia

The last performances of "Mr. Hopkinson" will take place at the Valencia this Saturday afternoon and evening, and on Sunday night Charles Cherry, last seen here as Maxine Elliott's leading man, will make us his first bow as a star in Clyde Fitch's last comedy, "The Bachelor." In "The Bachelor" it is said that the late playwright gave to the stage one of the most amusing, clever and brilliant comedies of his career. The comedy had quite a vogue in New York where it ran for six months, and also in Chicago. Aside from these cities, however, it is entirely new. The original cast will be seen here, including Ruth Maycliffe, Lillian Paige, Alice Riker, F. Percival Stevens, Charles Laite and others. "The Gay Musician," Julian Edwards' latest comic opera success, with a company of seventy-five, from Wallack's Theatre, New York, will follow "The Bachelor" at the Valencia.

George Hamlin, the American Tenor

Tenor recitals are very rare and Manager Greenbaum's announcement of three recitals by George Hamlin of Chicago will be more than welcomed by our concert-goers, especially as his accompanist is to be Edwin Schneider, the young composer whose song "Flower Rain" was one of the hits of the Jomelli concerts. Mr. Hamlin is a genuine artist and has a wonderful repertoire. He sings many almost forgotten German and Italian works as well as the classics and the latest songs of England and America. At his opening concert next Thursday night, December 2, at the Novelty Theatre, he will open with two old German works which he will group with Handel's "O, Sleep" and "The Trumpet's Loud Clangor." These will be followed by Schubert and Schumann numbers. Modern composers will be represented by Rubinstein, Brahms, Grieg and Strauss. From English sources we are promised such gems as the "Morning Hymn" of George Henschel and three numbers from Sir Arthur Sullivan's exquisite setting of Tennyson's "Songs of the Wren."

The Last Wullner Concert

Dr. Ludwig Wullner, called "the song interpreter extraordinary," will give his last recitals at the Novelty Theatre this Friday night and Sunday afternoon, November 28. The sale of seats is now in progress at Sherman, Clay & Co's and on Sunday the box office will be at the theatre where phone orders will receive careful attention. Sunday's offering will be a splendid one, consisting of a group of five Shubert gems, three of Carl Loewe's ballads, three Hugo Wolf numbers and a group of five of Richard Strauss' works. In addition there will be works entirely new here by Oskar Posa and Kurt Schindler.

Wright Lorimer as David

Wright Lorimer who comes to the Garrick on Monday night as a star in "The Shepherd King," makes his first western appearance in the Biblical play. "The Shepherd King" was written by Lorimer himself, and he will enact David, the shepherd boy who afterwards became the King of Israel. The love of David for Michal, the friendship of David and Jonathan, the vagaries of King Saul and the incantations of the witch of Endor are some of the principal features of the play. After the pastoral first act, there is a succession of events of absorbing interest until the curtain finally falls on the triumph of David, when Michal is restored to his arms and he is crowned King of Israel. The local engagement will be for three weeks, with matinees on Saturday only, and the usual Sunday night performances.

Another Week of Belasco's Play

A second week, and positively the last one this season, of "The Warrens of Virginia" is announced by the Alcazar management. This announcement will not surprise anyone who has witnessed the play, for that the regulation seven days' run would be exceeded was assured before the close of the initial performance. David Belasco's name, the potency of which is recognized by San Francisco's theatregoers, had much to do with drawing an unusually large first night audience, whose verdict served to fill the house at each succeeding presentation of the play and create a demand for seats that only a second week can satisfy. "The Warrens" could be profitably kept on the Alcazar stage a third week, but a contract calling for the presentation of "A Message from Mars" on December 6 cannot be ignored.

William H. Thompson at the Orpheum

William H. Thompson will appear at the Orpheum next week in a one act play by F. D. Bond called "Pride of Regiment." This playlet scored a great hit at the

He is sure of a cordial welcome for he is remembered for many notable characterizations, particularly for the Cardinal in "A Royal Family." He will be supported by Miss Allen and Fred J. Weber. Dan Quinlan and Kellar Mack, minstrel stars, bring a skit called "The Traveling Dentist." The Two Bobs are Bob Adams and Bob Alden, two writers of lyrics and jingling tunes. Mabel McCane sings her own songs. Next week will be the last of Ben Welch, Vittoria and Giorgetta, Katchen Loisset, and John B. Hymer and Co., in "The Devil and Tom Walker."

Costume Romance at Ye Liberty

The Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will entertain next week with "Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall," the costume play of the period of Queen Elizabeth and Mary Stuart. It is a dramatization by Paul Kester of Charles Major's popular novel of the same title and is one of the few really successful plays that have been taken from novels. The stage version of the story follows the novel very closely and in it, although young Mistress Vernon is made the central figure, Queen Elizabeth and her beautiful and ill-fated cousin, Mary Queen of Scots, play important parts. The play offers exceptional opportunities for the display of handsome scenery and costumes which Ye Liberty management will take advantage of, besides presenting a capable cast. The production will have the usual run of seven nights, after which "Facing the Music," a comedy new to stock audiences, will be given.

Robert Mantell's repertoire for this city will include "King Lear," "The Merchant of Venice," "Macbeth," "Romeo and Juliet," "As You Like It" and "Richard Third,"

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

Written exclusively for Town Talk by J. M. JACOBI

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

Evolution in Men's Dress

How little is actually known about the evolution of style in men's dress can today be realized only by those who delve into the subject and spend valuable time in the harrassing research necessary to dig out correct data, and then, after reliable information is secured, are able to go ahead and re-create the fashions that had a vogue at different periods. The accompanying illustration is a reproduction of the costumes as they were worn during the period of the following dates. From left to right the costumes represent the following periods and styles:

1. Civilian dress, period of 1683. (When William Penn lived.)
2. Civilian dress, period 1776. (George Washington period, or colonial.)
3. Civilian dress, period of 1824, Le Beau Monde style. The suit is an original and was worn in 1824 by a member of a prominent Philadelphia family. White coat with roll horsehair collar, satin waistcoat of cream white, white kerseymere pantaloons, tied close around the ankles, white stockings, white cravat with full frilled shirt.
4. An original "Tagliona overcoat," period of 1850. Black beaver cloth in coat, velvet buttons. The coat was obtained from the son of the father who wore it.
5. Civilian dress, period 1847 to 1850. Frock coat of black cloth, velvet collar and cuffs, purple embroidered waistcoat, white kerseymere trousers. Trousers made extraordinarily full over hips and the fulness mechanically exaggerated and permanency given by inserting whalebone down over hips to extend them. Measurements of trousers, knee, 28; ankle, 18; bottoms, 21. Tie, standing collar, wide stock.
6. Period of 1873. Long roll sack coat of dark blue crepe cloth, galoon braid edges, waistcoat of fancy embossed velvet in Dresden flower design. Pantaloons brown and blue hairline stripes, measurements, knee, 17½; ankle, 15¾; bottoms, 21½, wide spring bottoms. Large box-toed shoes.
7. Period of 1886. Four-button cutaway coat and vest of wide wale diagonal, trousers of pearl gray, wide flat braid on outseam, wide legs, knee, 24; bottoms, 20½.
8. Period of 1890. Long, sharply cutaway three-button sack coat of black cloth. Close fitting trousers.
10. Period of 1910. Good length coat, chesty effect, lines of coat to follow body but drape away from the body. Waistcoat, long narrow opening. Trousers, half peg with little break at bottom.

Among those who have purchased Chalmers and Hudson cars during the past two days are C. L. Laumeister, Dr. Thomas Sullivan, Mrs. S. F. Johnson, Samuel S. Hyman, Philip Clay, P. J. Gartland, L. J. Hemioulle, and S. E. Jameison of Ukiah.

Byron's Thyrza Identified

among the clans of the period. It is also known that Byron's great uncle who was a sort of raving and misanthropical maniac, had slain in a tavern brawl, by candle light, a relative named Chaworth, a crime for which he was tried before the House of Lords. Mary Chaworth, I think, was descended from that man. It is strange indeed that the fates of these families should be so intertwined through different generations.

It had been supposed that Byron was entirely separated from Mary Chaworth when she married John Musters. Mr. Edgcumbe has many arguments to show that this was not the case. In 1808 and 1809, we learn, Byron had not forgotten his boyhood love and was seeing her at Annesley. Recognizing the danger of this intercourse and driven by her husband, she avoide Byron and during this time of separation he wrote the mystifying Thyrza poems. At this time also he wrote to a friend of "a violent though pure love and passion" which had ended in a loss that would have moved him profoundly had he not already "supped full of horrors." The evidence that Mary Chaworth was the Thyrza of these beautiful lyrics cannot be reviewed here but it is set forth by Mr. Edgcumbe and is very strong. It may be mentioned in this connection that when Byron was asked by an intimate friend to whom these poems referred, he refused to tell with marks of agitation which prevented any further reference to the subject.

In 1813 Mr. and Mrs. Musters were estranged. This time Byron and she were again drawn together and more intimately. On April 15, 1814, a child, Medora, was born to them which Mrs. Leigh, then with Byron at Newstead, took as her own to prevent scandal. Mary repented bitterly of her fault and was afterwards reconciled with her husband. At the time of the Byron divorce proceedings, she was driven temporarily, by fear of exposure, into a state of mental alienation. It was to shield her that Mrs. Leigh, we are told, allowed the charges against herself to go unanswered. Here was an instance of heroic courage, remarkable but by no means incredible; conscious virtue has done that sort of thing many times indeed. Mr. Edgcombe lets it be understood that he has had access to the documents preserved by the Leigh, Chaworth and Musters families in support of these statements.

That the theory is the strongest and most credible that has been advanced to explain part of the mystery in which the whole career of Byron was enfolded, is the judgment of competent literary critics. It will be remembered that Moore, who had read Byron's journal before destroying it and who was in all respects better acquainted than any other man with Byron's whole career, made this declaration in the biography: "It may be questioned whether his heart had ever much share in his passions. Actual objects there were, in but too great number, who, as long as the illusion continued, kindled up his thoughts and were the themes of his songs. But they were little more than mere dreams of the hour. There was but one love that lived unquenched through all." This last sentence has never been intelligible before; now it takes on definite meaning. Hitherto it has been considered that Byron was only carrying out his romantic pose when he professed in his poems a single life-long passion for one named Mary. Now his professions may be believed. It may be that Byron is destined to stand forth as one of the great lovers of history. It would be a strange and happy outcome of a distasteful controversy and it would be almost universally welcomed, for Byron remains today, as he was in his lifetime, perhaps the most compelling figure in English poetical history.

A Vigia

two, has probably replaced an earlier sheep track or a footpath of the monks. The dazzling white houses, with their thatched roofs secured against the wind by stones slung in a rope, only require a little more neglect to fall again into the low, black Pictish huts. The swarthy people, courteous and suave, in whom you see a vein of subcutaneous sarcasm, as they lean up against a house, sizing the passing stranger up to the last tittle at a glance, would all look natural enough with glibs of matted hair, long saffron Keltic shirts and the Isles kilt, made out of a long web of cloth, leaving the right arm bare.

Still in the Isle of Dreams remains the primitive familiarity between the animals and man, which only lingers on in islands or in the regions where no breath of modern life has set a bar between two branches of the same creation with talk about the soul. The still, soft rain yet blots the island from the world, just as it did of yore, and through its pall the mysterious voices of the sea sound just as menacing and hostile to mankind, as they did when the saint preached to the seals upon the reef. Perhaps—who knows?—he preaches yet to those who have the gift of a right hearing of the soft, grating noise the pebbles make in a receding wave upon the beach. The wind continues its perpetual monsoon, blowing across the unpolluted ocean for a thousand leagues. In the white coves the black sea-purses which the tide throws up like necklaces of an antique and prehistoric pattern are spread upon the sands, waiting the evening when the mermaids issue from the waves and clasp them round their necks.

To have seen it once, is to have seen it to the last day of one's life. The horses waiting at the rough pierhead to swim a mile of channel with its fierce, sweeping tide, the little street in which the houses spring from the living rock which crops up here and there and forms a reef right in the middle of the road, are not a memory, but a possession, as real as if you held the title-deeds duly engrossed and sealed. When all is said and done, the one secure and lasting property a man can own is an enchanted city such as one sees loom in the sky, above the desert sands. That, when you once have seen it, is yours forever, and next comes a Vigia, which but appears for a brief moment, in the mind, as you sail past on some imaginary sea.

Auto Notes

The Ford Coupe promises to be one of the most popular low priced closed cars for the wet season. The Standard Motor Car Co., 583 Golden Gate avenue, are making immediate deliveries of these classy little cars.

One of the most significant financial deals that have been consummated recently in this part of the country, with reference to the automobile industry was made the other day when the Coast Carriage Company of Oakland and its big building at the corner of Twelfth and Jackson streets passed into the possession of the Studebaker interests. Chester N. Weaver, vice-president and general manager of the Studebaker Bros. Company of California, by whom the deal was closed, refuses to name the amount involved in the transaction, but, it is generally understood that the figures are close to $100,000.

Mr. W. L. Hughson, President of the Standard Motor Car Company, and Western agent for the Ford car, has just returned from Los Angeles and other points in the southern section of the state. In speaking of his trip the local motorist said: "Conditions throughout the state are such that I expect a big business in the motor car delivery this season. Our agents in the interior are all doing good business; in fact, selling more cars than any other season. This is especially true of our reports in the vicinity of Los Angeles where the sales now, even at this season, amount to twice as much as they did all of last year. The people are buying cars in the southern part of the state much faster than they are here. This, I believe, is partly due to the fact that they have much better roads there than in this territory."

H. R. Williams of Seattle is an enthusiastic advocate of Diamond Mountain Tread Tires. In a recent letter to the Diamond Company he states that he has averaged 8,096 miles on the Diamond Tires which equipped his Packard, Model 18, in which he has covered some of the roughest country in the northwest.

Louis E. Shurtleff, a well-known salesman of this city who for several years has been connected with Shreve's Jewelry Company, has joined the salesforce of the Studebaker Bros. Company under John H. Eagal, manager of the automobile department.

The new Randolph delivery wagon of the Pioneer Automobile Company was again pressed into service recently when it became necessary to move some iron girders weighing three and a half tons. These girders which are intended for use in alterations of the building now occupied by the Pioneer Automobile Company were deposited on the sidewalk in front of the garage. It was the work of but a few minutes to attach a rope to the rear axle of the car, and with Charles O'Day at the wheel, swing the big beams into the desired place.

The gold plated Studebaker "40" landaulet, one of the most exquisitely finished automobiles ever seen in this city, which attracted so much attention at the private automobile show of the Studebaker Bros. Company during the Portola festivities, has been sold to H. E. Bothin, a well-known local capitalist. The gold plated car was sold during the Portola week but, at the request of Studebaker Bros. Bothin permitted it to remain on exhibition until a few days ago.

Roy D. Chapin of the Chalmers-Detroit Motor Company, speaking of entering their cars in races, says: "We do not send cars into contests merely for the sport of it. We send cars into contests for the purpose of showing the public that our cars have all the stamina that we claim for them. A motor car that is driven 200 miles at highest speed undergoes an infinitely severer strain than the average owner gives his car in a whole year of use, but the fact that the Chalmers car wins so consistently is the best proof we know of that they have no weak points."

R. K. Roberts of the Howard Automobile Company, who has just returned from a business trip down the coast, in commenting on the situation said: "Without question conditions generally are most encouraging. It is gratifying in the extreme to encounter such optimism on every hand as is prevalent at the present time to a degree that has never before existed. I found that the only anxiety of our local agents is concerning our ability to make deliveries to meet their requirements, and without exception they demanded and voluntarily signed up for material increases over their contracts of last year."

An interesting trip over the rough mountain roads in the northern part of the state has just been completed by A. L. Hendricks of Eureka, who made the trip in a Ford car. In speaking of the trip the Eureka motorist said: "I have owned a six-cylinder Ford for sometime and have given it several hard tests but the trip that I have just finished was one of the worst I have ever taken. Notwithstanding the terrible conditions of the roads over which I traveled, my car gave me no trouble and in places it was only by the use of the slow speed that I was able to get over some of the roads at all." The roads in the northern part of the state are in very bad condition owing to the recent rains and from now until spring touring in automobiles through this section of the state will be a difficult proposition. Mr. Hendricks is an expert driver and was at the wheel of the car all during the trip and declared that notwithstanding that the tour was a pleasure one, it proved to be more strenuous than the average endurance run and the fact that his car gave him no trouble was the cause of a great deal of satisfaction.

That the performance of the little Studebaker E-M-F "30" in the recent Los Angeles-Phoenix race, when it lowered the previous record by nearly five and one-half hours, was remarkable for a car of its power and price, is generally recognized by automobile experts. But Bert Latham who successfully piloted the machine desired to further demonstrate the sturdiness of his car and drove his machine back to Los Angeles over the same course. The E-M-F was the only machine to return to Los Angeles under its own power after the conclusion of the events in the Arizona metropolis.

Letters

"The Clue," by Carolyn Wells

Carolyn Wells, an admitted lover of detective yarns, can do quite as good a piece of work in that line herself as any but the masters of the craft. "The Clue" which gives title to her latest effort was trifling and insignificant enough to have pleased even Sherlock Holmes himself—simply a cachou—an infinitesimal silvered pellet dropped on the floor of one of the rooms of a mansion in which a mysterious death had taken place. Miss Van Norman, a wealthy young woman without relatives save one very distant cousin, was found dead in her own library on the eve of her wedding day. Circumstances at first pointed to suicide but the absence of any reason for such a step, coupled with the persistent questioning of the physician first summoned finally convinced his older colleague that there was at least ground for an extended inquiry. The case was a baffling one, since there was no discoverable motive for the crime. The only persons who occupied the house on that night were the old and tried servants and the wedding guests, all women, besides a plain clothes detective employed to keep watch over the gifts, unknown to any but the one who engaged him. The house was securely locked and no unusual sound was heard until the cry for help was given about an hour after all the inmates had retired. The trifling little pellet picked up on the drawing room floor two or three days after the murder led to the solution of the mystery. Miss Wells has been a bit careless in her dialogue, for, in detective stories, more than in any other variety of fiction, the author needs to be careful about not making revelations unwittingly. Kitty French and Robert Fessenden, both deeply interested in discovering the truth, strangers to each other heretofore and to the locality, would not be likely to forget names and circumstances talked over in connection with the case or any of the suspects, yet on page 82, on the morning after the crime, in his first conversation with Kitty, Fessenden mentions Miss Burt, asks if Kitty knows her, and learning that she does not, explains her position. On page 167, two days later, the same questions and answers are given. Some people do not care for detective stories at all. Others are eager devourers of them, and these will find "The Clue" rather better than the average, since the mystery which is like the answer to a riddle, is so well veiled that it would take Melville Stone himself to forecast it. Published by the J. P. Lippincott Co.

"The Confessions of a Macedonian Bandit"

Albert Sonnichsen has a faculty which may well be both envied and emulated by writers of far greater pretensions—that of making himself profoundly interesting. His new book, "The Confessions of a Macedonian Bandit," has the additional merit of coming in the nick of time as an explanatory sidelight on the triumphs of the Young Turks, culminating in the deposition of Abdul Hamid. Mr. Sonnichsen, it will be remembered, left San Francisco some years ago, at the beginning of one of the perennial outbreaks, to go into the Balkans, partly out of personal interest in the activities and partly to act as a newspaper correspondent. His complete disappearance gave rise to a rumor that he had been captured and assassinated by the brigands, and there was some chance that international complications would arise. Mr. Sonnichsen, however, had only yielded to the call of the blood, the nomadic strain which he inherits from his ancestors on both sides, and instead of being a victim, for the time being, he became himself a "bandit," joining the ranks of the revolutionists and seeing from the inside. His present narrative begins with his mysterious disappearance from Voden, where, having arrived provided with an official passport, he ordered dinner at the hotel, went out for a walk ostensibly for half an hour, and dropped completely from sight. He was in reality an accredited member of the Committee of Revolution, and his movements were in accord with the program already prepared. Even if one had no interest in the personality of the author or the cause with which he identified himself, here is a book of travels in unbeaten paths amongst a people little known, which the author has contrived to make as interesting as any novel of adventure. There are constant changes of scene, new characters introduced, new disguises donned, and an ever watchful alertness against surprises. The hide and seek of the Turkish soldiery, the plots within plots, socialist against royalist, Turk against Greek and Greek against Bulgarian, and each against the others, are all graphically portrayed. We learn of the Church army of the Greek hierarchy which kills its enemies singly and makes reprisals against whole villages; of hired cut throats acting in the interests of one faction against the other; of officers in the Turkish army who are at heart with the revolutionists, and constantly there is the ready expedient by which suspicion is diverted and the "illegals" pass unscathed though they escape but with the skin of their teeth. And side by side with these medieval conditions we are confronted with extreme modernity, as when Tashko, the leader of one division of the rebellious, surprised in the midst of his operations, carries with him into hidding his home-made camera and the undeveloped plate on which he was at work, though his command must remain in hiding indefinitely in the woods. It is not to be assumed that the Macedonian insurgents were an undisciplined mob. On the contrary, they had a well defined organization, and one could heartily wish that some of the same common sense and regard for equity could be introduced into our own court procedure as that which marked the almost off-hand decisions of the voyvodas when the Turkish courts were under boycott, though it was well understood that the pronouncements were but a method of living, to be reviewed by constituted authorities later on. Mr. Sonnichsen, apparently without an effort in that direction, has managed to present the men with whom he was for the most part in close contact, Luka, Teodor, Sandy and Vladi, in a most favorable light, and as all but the last named paid the forfeit of their lives in action, we may at least accept the most charitable view of their transactions as made necessary under the circumstances. The book is illustrated with sixteen photographs taken by the author, and as far as one may judge character from such pictures the men present evidence of a high order of intelligence. Even Apostol, a genuine bandit who "reformed," theatrical, gossipy, and credited by Abdul Hamid as the leading spirit of the revolution, though he was in truth a very subordinate character, and is very far from being idealized in the recital, probably makes a better impression than he deserves. Duffield is the publisher of this chapter of the Memoirs of Albert Sonnichsen who, doubtless, will some day inspire the pen of a novelist, since he is one of the picturesque characters of our age, his "Deep Sea Vagabonds," "Ten Months Captive among the Fillipinos," and now "The Confessions of a Macedonian Bandit," forming a trilogy which, taken in connection with the other experiences and adventures of the author, furnish material not to be met with outside the career of the famous soldiers of fortune of three and four centuries ago.

Footballwocky

'Twas killing, and the muddied coves
Did jab and jibber on the grid;
All glory were the football groves,
And that halfback, the Kid.

"Beware the Sluggawock, my son,
The forward pass, the oft-jarred spine,
Beware the Tacklebob, and run
For good old Umptywine."

He took the football in his hand,
Long time another's life he sought;
And then he rested (couldn't stand)
Till ambulance was brought.

And, bandaged up, in bed he rocks,
And Sluggawock, right from the game,
Came lumbering in, with fresher knocks,
And left him still more lame.

"Hooroo, hooroo," the whistle blew,
The rooters still kept up their clack,
But March hares danced his system through
And dealt him hack on hack.

"And hast thou slain the Sluggawock?
Come to my arms, my squeamish boy";
"Kazoo, kazay," the rooters bray
In seasonable joy.

Smart Diplomacy

Prince Jaisingrao, the son of the Gaekwar of Baroda, denied in New York recently that his father had said he found American women ugly.

"My father," said the young man, "is too adroit to make such a remark as that. Even if he thought it—and he doesn't—he wouldn't dream of saying it. He is too adroit. Listen.

"Once my father attended a Christmas ball at an English country house. He was introduced to a woman whose name he did not catch, and he asked her to dance with him. As they danced in the ballroom, hung with mistletoe and holly, my father saw an officer who had once deceived him in India.

"'Do you see that man over there?' said my father to his pretty partner. 'Well, if there's one man in the world I hate, it's he.'

"'Yes?' said the woman. 'That's my husband."

"'Yes,' said my adroit father. 'Yes, of course. That's why I hate him.'"

"You seem to have no ambition," asserted the strenuous one.

"But I have," said the indolent man. "I intend to be rich."

"Then why don't you work—like Brown, for instance?"

"Ah," said the indolent man, "I've had my eye on him for some time. Good fellow, Brown! I like to see him piling wealth up. He's working for me.

"Yes, he's killing himself making a fortune, and I plan to get it by marrying his widow."

Student Humor

"When a student does not know

he will simply leave a blank space he is not he will either try to latter cases are rare, and the result erally painful, doing harm to the who wrote the paper.

"Occasionally, however, there will real gem, which does the student good putting the professor in a good humor so making him unconsciously mark paper less severely.

"I came across two such gems in one paper recently. One question was, 'Who was St. Bruno?' to which the student replied, 'St. Bruno was a Great Dane, a brother of St. Bernard.'

"The other question was, 'What was the difference between the major prophets and the minor prophets?' Here he answered, 'It would not be right for me, a sinner, to make invidious comparisons between such holy men.'"

Hero-Worship

We have come to the conclusion that human glory is not so unstable as many wise philosophers have imagined. It is not true, in our opinion, that the people are glad to view eminent men in disadvantageous lights. It is true that genuine heroes, deserving of the most amiable indulgence, alienate the affections by some trivial indiscretion, as was the case with Admiral Dewey, but on the other hand brummagem heroes, mere pretenders, retain their hold on the imagination of the public even after they have forfeited esteem by the most convincing evidence of their unworthiness. The truth seems to be that glory is the more enduring in proportion to the degree of deception practiced in its attainment. And probably the explanation of this is that we are reluctant to acknowledge even to ourselves that we have suffered from imposture. Having been deceived we hate to be undeceived and thus made conscious of our gullibility, and the consequence is that men in public life who have captured the imagination of the multitude by spectacular performances and the impressive affectation of a superior virtue, are permitted to profit by the false reputation they have acquired long after the joints in their harness have been exposed to view. There would not be so many heroes in civil life if we did not lose sight of the fact that there is very little difference between one man and another. It is the misfortune of the masses to think by infection, to catch a passion like a cold, and hence the comparison of mankind to a gaping monster that loves to be deceived and is seldom disappointed.

The Voice of the People

The following letter from Berkeley tending as it does to persuade us that we do not accurately adapt words to our thoughts fills us with chagrin and mortification:

Editor Town Talk: You had a good deal to say last week about Dr. Wheeler's opening lecture in Berlin on the subject of "The Power of Public Opinion in America," which you say is a rehash of De Tocqueville, adding that whereas the French writer passed judgment on our institutions, the President of the California University merely presented facts without drawing conclusions. You are of the opinion that Dr. Wheeler presented a picture of a nation ruled by demagogues without being conscious of the ugliness of it. Evidently you have great contempt for public opinion, and evidently, too, you have a very poor opinion of any man whose views do not coincide with your own. If as you admit public opinion is the origin of all power in the United States then why should we not respect it and hold it in esteem? We are satisfied with our government, which means that we are satisfied with the source from which that government derives its power. Why should not the American politician, as Dr. Wheeler says, "be glad to devote all his astuteness and all his best powers of judgment to divining and calculating the direction which public opinion might conceivably take?" You say that the "logical deduction from President Wheeler's observations is that public opinion in this country has a most pernicious effect on public life." How such a deduction can be logically made I cannot see and I am sure that you can't either. The trouble with you appears to be that you do not realize that democracy is no longer an experiment. Dr. Wheeler you do not understand because he has the enthusiasm of a man who understands that democracy has given unmistakable proof of its energy as a principle of action; that it has lived up to the predictions of our forefathers who gave us a Constitution founded on the immutable basis of natural right and general happiness. I enjoy your paper very much for its cleverness, its sanity and its sentiments generally, but I have been often amazed at your views on the fundamentals of democracy. My advice to you is to try to think better of public opinion. Public opinion is a fine thing. It has made us the greatest and most civilized nation on earth.—A Republican.

From the foregoing it is evident that we have been playing most awkwardly on the instrument of words, for we have failed to make ourselves intelligible to our correspondent, a resident of the most enlightened town in California, a person capable of appreciating what is good, peradventure a pundit of the university that boasts at once a Wheeler and a Boke. Here is a man who has absolutely misapprehended views that we tried most carefully to express. We did not intend to convey the impression that we hold public opinion in contempt. We do not believe that any sensible man is contemptuous of anything so powerful as public opinion. But one can appreciate public opinion without holding in esteem those servants of the people whose sense of public duty is so perverted that they confound it with self-interest and spend all their time, as Dr. Wheeler says, "in divining and calculating the direction which public opinion might conceivably take." It is because Dr. Wheeler apparently sees nothing to reprehend in the conduct of political "trimmers" whose life is a lie reduced to practice, and who are influenced by no other views than the sordid lure of salary and power that we took occasion to release a few strictures on his remarkable Berlin lecture. Because the origin of all political right must inevitably rest in the acquiescence of the people statesmen are not justified in paying deference to public opinion whether public opinion be right or wrong. It is a most pernicious error to suppose that under our system of government men are chosen for office to follow blindly the dictates of public opinion. They are chosen for office on the theory that they are mentally and morally fitted for public service and that they will be guided not by what they might suppose the fickle will of the people to be but by the principles upon which the institutions of the country are founded. Many years ago Mademoiselle Mars, one of the most distinguished French actresses of her day, was in the habit of saying, How much better we should play if we cared less for applause. The same is true of statesmen. Their performances are not to be improved by an appetite for the applause that follows fawning and a hungry attention to the whims of the multitude.

A Mischievous Maxim

Our Berkeley friend, we suspect, is laboring under the delusion that the maxim of democracy is Vov populi vox Dei. The world has long since come to the conclusion that this is a very mischievous maxim. The people have too often uttered themselves unreasonably and with evil effect to be regarded as infallible. The doctrine Vox populi vox Dei is essentially as unrepublican as the doctrine that the people may do what they wish under the constitution. The true patriot in public life is not governed by such doctrine. Nor does he believe it to be his duty to be swayed by the temporary opinions or passions of the unarticulated masses. Rather does he conceive it to be his duty to inform public opinion and thwart those insinuating demagogues who would sophistically confound the rights of the people with their power. He knows that as each individual is an erring man the united clamor of erring men cannot have the character of divinity about it. Woe to the country, it has been said, in which political hypocrisy first calls the people almighty and then teaches them that the voice of the people is divine. The next step is to construe the clamor of the mob as the voice of the people, and eventually the press is employed to get up the desired clamor. The last step has already been taken in this country. The press has induced the clamor for the throwing of more and more power into the hands of the masses, for increasing the power of public opinion, which means that we are as certainly being led to the abandonment of the self-government that was given us under institutional forms as were the Romans in the days of the Caesars, the people of Athens after the Peloponnesian war. The tendency of the times is unmistakably to the absolutism of the majority, a tendency that is not apparent to our Berkeley correspondent who imagines that the institutions founded by our forefathers have been preserved in all their pristine purity.

Jefferson's Predictions

In the dictum that democracy has lived up to the predictions of our forefathers we are by no means inclined to concur. Thomas Jefferson made a prediction as to the social influence which democracy would exert in this country. He said that it would revive in this Western hemisphere the simplicity and refinement of taste which, as he imagined, had characterized the society of ancient Greece. In his day he objected to young Americans visiting Europe, "lest they should acquire the taste for luxury and dissipation prevalent in the capitals of the Old World." He believed that everything intellectual and virtuous would be attracted to the New Atlantis. A chaster style in art and letters would, he thought, be developed under our Republican institutions. "No man living," he wrote, "will ever see an instance of an American removing to settle in Europe, while we shall see multiplied instances of Europeans going to live in America." Have these anticipations been fulfilled? The United States has produced many writers but not one who can be said to have embodied in an original form the national genius of the American people. After more than a hundred years of national existence we still send men and women abroad to study art in all its forms, and the only persons that come to this country from Europe to settle are those that come to make a living. The United States is the hot-bed of luxury and dissipation, and it is to Europe that refined Americans go to gratify their taste for the things that contribute to the moral and mental exaltation of mankind. It is notorious that the most conspicuously vulgar people in Europe are newrich tourists from the home of democracy. Jefferson also prophesied that the moral atmosphere of the Republic would be favorable to honesty and integrity, and that a higher standard in commercial dealings would in consequence arise. Surely this prediction has not been fulfilled. It must be apparent even to residents of Berkeley that the vices of the Old World have sprouted up with increased luxuriance on American soil.

English and Other Britons

For a great many years it has been regarded as a rule, proved by an occasional exception, that the Englishman born in London would never attain distinction. Whether it be the influence of the fog or the cold or the bad air or whatnot, the Londoner suffers from an impediment to his genius. So it has been accepted as inevitable that London's great men should come from the English provinces where life gets a better start. Now it looks as though the rule would have to be broadened, for there are signs a-plenty that the Briton born in England is being overtopped by the Briton born in other parts of the empire, principally Ireland. The Briton born in Ireland has long been crowding the Briton born in England for foremost distinction in all fields of human activity. In London the Irish playwright, poet, novelist, editor, journalist is plucking the choicest fruits in the garden of prosperity; the Irishman in Parliament, in the army, the navy and the church makes the Englishman in any of these careers more that uneasy. It is the same with science, with sport—go where you will, the son of the green sod is winning supremacy over the son of the tight little island. In the field of aviation we have the latest and most pointed illustration of this condition of affairs. America, France and Germany have led the world in the manipulation of the heavier-than-air machines. Where is England's aviator? A prize of £1,000 was offered to the first British aviator who should succeed with a British-made aeroplane in flying over a circular course of one mile. Every aviator of British birth failed to capture the prize until a young Irishman came forward and won it handily. Naturally England is chagrined at this state of affairs, but chagrin was never yet known to alter a law of nature. The favorite salve for wounded English pride consists in the thought that racial considerations are unimportant where science is concerned. That may be so, but the conduct of England has never proved it in any instance where her sons have been forced to accept second or third place in competitions of art or science or sport.

A New Anesthetic

Once more comes the report that a new anesthetic has been discovered, one that is bound to prove a great boon to mankind. The search for an anesthetic that will produce a perfect analgesia without any of the usual ill effects which surgeons now have to reckon with has occupied the attention of scientists for many years, and so often have reports of success been made without foundation that the medical profession regards with distrust everybody who pretends to have solved the great problem. Considering however the source of the latest report the new anesthetic is likely to excite a good deal of interest. The discoverer is Professor Jonnesco, dean of the University of Bucharest. Although a man of the highest standing at home, when he appeared in London a short time ago he experienced great difficulty in securing a hearing and an opportunity for a demonstration. No class of men are more conservative, more fearful of countenancing even a suggestion of unorthodoxy, let alone charlatanism than British medical men, and they viewed Professor Jonnesco with suspicion from the moment that he announced that in stovaine he had found the ideal anesthetic. Fortunately, however, meeting Dr. Bland-Sutton, one of the greatest surgeons in England, his difficulties were removed, and surrounded by scientists he performed an operation at the Seamen's Hospital at Greenwich that caused a great sensation and won for him the applause of the Royal Society of Medicine. Professor Jonnesco has demonstrated that a mixture of neutral sulphate of strychnine with stovaine in solution produces a perfect analgesia. In hundreds of operations of all kinds on all parts of the body, from head to feet, and on patients varying in age from 21 months to 75 years he did not find a single instance of the heart or the respiration being affected. He has maintained the condition of analgesia during various periods up to two hours, which was the longest. In no case yet has there been the slightest ill effect from stovaine. Professor Jonnesco is coming to this country and doubtless he will receive the attention that he deserves. If his anesthetic is all that it is said to be he is entitled to rank with the greatest benefactors of mankind.

In London the other day Dolly Parnell of the chorus married Prince Nasir Ali Khan of India and received jewels worth $100,000 as a wedding gift. In the competition for titles the chorus still leads the heiress brigade and raises the average of romance in the matrimonial affairs of the nobility by employing nothing but personal charms as a lure.

According to Walter F. Wilcox, the Cornell statistician, there are 40,000 more married men in this country than there are married women. And yet nobody has advised the imposition of a tax on old maids.

William J. Bryan is now thinking of turning Prohibitionist. The saloon keepers of the country should rejoice at the prospect of such a consistent loser espousing the cause they hate.

Engineer Dockweiler, who has estimated the Spring Valley properties at $24,000,000, was enthusiastic over the possibility of buying them for $35,000,000.—Chronicle. But Dockweiler made that estimate for the reformers when they were making political capital out of their hostility to the octopus.

Timgad, an African Pompeii

A Roman City Founded by Trajan and Destroyed by the Berbers, Excavated from the Sands of Algeria, Together With the Remains of a Christian City Built Upon its Ruins

By Rene Fage

Dead for many centuries, its site forgotten and its name preserved only in certain ancient writings, Timgad has shaken off the mantle of sand that entirely covered it and come forth once more into the Algerian sunshine. To M. Albert Ballu, director of the Service des Monuments Historiques, we owe the excavation of this ancient Thamugadi, the important Roman city founded by Trajan at the entrance to the defiles of the Aures. In less than twenty years Timgad has been exhumed, and it now remains to unearth the suburbs that stretched away toward Tebessa, Mascula and Lambese.

The last campaign of digging uncovered the extension of the Triumphal Avenue along an extent of nearly seven hundred feet, and that of the Decumanus-Maximus-Est till a monumental arch was reached that resembles the beautiful gate of Lambese. The fluted Corinthian columns, the cornices, the frieze and the entire entablature lay scattered about on the ground; an inscription informs us that the arch dates from 171, A. D. The slabs of the pavement still show the deep ruts worn by chariot-wheels in the days of Marcus Aurelius.

Other highways were discovered outside the city walls, bordered with little shops, with workrooms and workmen's lodgings in the rear as well as the shopkeepers' own abodes. Here the country people could make purchases at once without entering the city. Soldiers from the Augustan Third Legion used to congregate here.

Among mediocre dwellings rose certain larger, more luxurious houses, with paved vestibules at the front and porticoes around the outside. Huge square basins occupied the middle of these buildings, and the rooms opened upon atriums paved with marble mosaics.

The principal event of the campaign was the excavation of the great Timgad Monastery. The diggings of the preceding years had unearthed the basilica and several contiguous buildings. The work is finished now. We see the long alignment of galleries and cells, the common rooms, the lavatory and laundry, and the hexagonal baptistry with its central tank, which was reached by three steps sheathed in mosaics. Extensive additions to the abbey show how the community grew and prospered.

And this magnificent Christian edifice, 530 feet long by 230 broad, disappeared one day like all the pagan monuments of Timgad, when the barbaric invaders swooped down from the Aures. A cemetery was established on the site, and it has been necessary to remove the tombs in order to reach the monastery pavements below. And they are worth all the toil it takes to recover them. They are adorned with zigzags, chrisms, laurel leaves, and panels in bright and varied colors.

Still more remarkable are those that M. Ballu discovered in two houses within the city. One of these mosaics represents a nude sea goddess dressing her hair. Two genii, likewise nude, bear her aloft upon a seashell. Dolphins gambol about her. The background of the picture consists of red drapery. The other mosaic, framed in acanthus leaves, tendrils and volutes, with birds flitting among them, shows us another nude goddess, in the midst of the waves, seated upon a Triton's tail; she holds up her tresses with her hand; a light filmy veil floats above her head.

No one knows what the next diggings will bring forth. Has Timgad yielded up her last secret? Perhaps inscriptions will enable scholars to write her history, though I fear that it will remain shrouded in mystery for a long time to come. Still, I confess that this absence of details, this lack of knowledge, give an added charm to the dead city.

When last I saw Timgad, a cold mist covered the treeless plateau. Not a house was to be seen as we followed the road from Lambese. I climbed the first foothills of the Aures, whose summits were barely visible along the horizon. Poor farms, a dismal green, were lost among the brush. Oh but the landscape looked gloomy!

The wind swept the mist away, and a pale ray of light tinted the mountain background a delicate purple. The air had a rosy transparency when the whole city came before me, gently outlined along the slope of a hill. Its arches of triumph, its columns and pilasters, and the broken walls of its houses and shops and temples lay ranged along broad avenues. In the centre, the symmetrical lines of the forum made a starting place for paved streets leading to the theatre and the baths. Further on was the jumbled mass of a Byzantine fort. Around this tangle of ruins were still other ruins, foundations rising from the earth, half-broken arches, remains of houses, and pillars of basilicas; all this reached away and away, out from the inclosure of the city, till lost in the bare desert country.

Viewed thus, in the glaring sunshine and beneath that humid sky, the dead city of Timgad seems as if seen in a dream. You can understand how men should have forgotten it and allowed it to sleep so long beneath the sand. But when you come nearer, now that it has been almost wholly uncovered, you see how sumptuous and how wonderfully alive it must once have been.

You enter by a triumphal gate, adorned with pedestals that supported statues. The Cardo Nord, once bordered with porticoes, leads in a straight line to the forum, passing before a magnificent semicircular building that must have been a library. Here are the propylaea and stairway of the public square where the people of Timgad assembled. A gallery, whose columns rested upon a high masonry base, adorned its four sides; there the statues of gods and emperors were erected. No buildings came, as at Rome, to encumber the open space. Timgad's forum remained what it had been in the third century. It is easy to reconstruct it in imagination. On its four sides rose the civil basilica and its dependencies, the tribune for the orators before the temple of Victory, the chamber where the Senate sat, the prison, several shops, and halls for public meetings. All those edifices are perfectly recognizable.

But what silence, where once was such life and bustle! This is the place where the philosophers debated while walking among statues of the gods. Grouped before these rostra, the voters listened to the harangues of statesmen, while idle youngsters lay in the shade of these glorious plinths, playing ancient games. On the pavement you see where gaming tables have been cut with a knife, and you read the inscription near by: "Venari, Lavari, Ludere, Ridere, Oc Est Vivere." By interpretation, to hunt, to bathe, to play, to laugh—that is to live. This phrase, carved upon a pavement slab, around a bird pecking at a flower, doubtless sums up the life of a rich Timgad patrician.

One should go rambling haphazard along the white streets of the city. What surprising rencontres! What reminders of the past! From the theatre, with its twenty-five tiers, to Trajan's triumphal arch, you pass before baths whose rooms are covered with mosaic and before houses that were provided with every imaginable

In Spite of All

By Charles Derennes (From the French)

"Ha! Ha! There comes my baron! I knew I would meet him here tonight." And the tall svelte Sonia, exquisitely dressed, her diamond necklace glinting in the electric light, rose from her seat and rushed toward the door. M. Roland, the owner of the place, however, was before her, and was bowing low.

"Good evening, monsieur le baron; if monsieur le baron will take the trouble—"

He reached eagerly for the baron's hat and coat.

In this fashionable restaurant the dishes clicked and the glasses clinked; the piano and the violin were pouring forth a flood of melody; some negro minstrels were howling an American song and monsieur le baron walked proudly forward, smiling to the right and to the left, satisfied with himself, sure of himself, like a prince regent whose father is firmly seated upon the throne.

For a long time this man had been one of the most brilliant of those who frequented the fashionable restaurants. Whence came he? Who was he? No one asked nor cared to ask. He carried himself well, could talk fluently of races and automobiles and had a few new anecdotes pertaining to the aristocracy. He was generous in his tips to the waiters, and as he was rather good looking, he had little difficulty in posing as a hero from midnight until four o'clock in the morning.

"Dearest! How are you? You have not been unfaithful to me during my absence?"

The tall Sonia who, it was well known, loved the baron, had disappeared for three days, stating that she had gone to attend the marriage of her brother, an officer in the army. But she had not forgotten the man she loved. Her silvery laugh echoed throughout the restaurant; she was proud to claim him; the envious looks of the other women flattered her. She called him by her pet name: "Coco"; and it was repeated from table to table. The women commented with their friends and companions:

"Sonia is certainly in luck! Such a handsome man! Such a beautiful blond moustache, such eyes! So distingue and so rich! Besides——a baron."

He, flattered by the handsome woman and conscious in a way of what was said about him by the guests, smiled like a conqueror. The waiters gathered about, eager to do his bidding, and the proprietor, M. Roland, watched carefully that he should be well served.

Suddenly the door of the restaurant opened and a pale woman, very modestly dressed, entered. In a startled way, momentarily blinded by the electric lights, she gazed about her as if searching for someone. She must have made a mistake, for upon her face there was such an expression of purity that it was evident to all who saw her that she did not belong there.

M. Roland, somewhat surprised, but always a gentleman in manner, advanced to her and bowed respectfully.

"What does madame desire?" he inquired.

She did not answer him, but walked quickly between the lines of tables occupied by men in full dess and women decollettees, an expression of agony upon her face, a face which nevertheless was pretty, very touching; her eyes were like moist violets; she wore a plain black dress and her hat was one of those which are bought for a few cents at bargain counters.

She saw monsieur le baron and, walking quickly up to him, said in a low nervous tone:

"Come here, James, I beg of you. Our son is very ill, and is asking for his father."

The man stammered; his jaws seemed to move without being able to articulate a word. Amazed, Sonia looked from the baron to the newcomer. The woman in black said very sweetly:

"I am his wife, mademoiselle."

"Madame, I beg your pardon. I didn't know."

Then she rose and pushed back her chair with a movement of repulsion, as if she wished to get away from the man who was seated at the table with her.

He waved his hands around like one who has lost his wits and stuttered:

"Oh, this is a good joke! This is really funny! Ha, ha, ha!"

"No, James," cried the poor woman, "there is nothing funny about this. I am not here to criticize; I am and have been resigned to everything, as you know, for many years. I ask you only one thing. Come to our little boy. I have a carriage waiting outside. Come! Not for my sake, but for his. In the delirium of his fever he called for you. Then, you understand, when I heard the child's cry, I came out to find you. If you have a little heart left, spare me this torture; don't compel me to say these things before all these people in a restaurant."

He had been nervously twisting his moustache, that handsome blond moustache. He brought his fist down on the table.

"Get out of here! I'll decide what I'll do later on—and above all, I don't want any scenes! No scenes—understand?"

"Scenes? Am I making any scene? Have I ever reproached you? Have I not suffered in silence without asking a single question, even when you stayed days away from your office, leaving the employment which I myself secured for you? Do you think I have been your dupe? Oh, no! I knew where you spent your nights and well I knew that you tried to pass yourself off as a baron."

The wretch, overwhelmed, whispered to her:

"Talk lower, I beg of you!"

The waiters and employees had gathered about them, as had many of the guests, yearning to hear more.

The woman who had suffered in silence so many years could restrain her indignation no longer. She felt that she must cry her rage over the roofs and tell it to everyone, even if he should kill her, even if she herself must die of pain and shame.

"Yes, you made these people believe that you were a baron. You have been spending a large amount of money! Where did you get it? Did you steal it? Did I ever ask anything of you, although time and again when the door-bell rang I thought it was the sheriff come to arrest you? And now, even now, if you had come with me as I asked you, to see our little one, you could have come back here and told these people that I was only one of your servants, and God knows I would never have interfered in this sinful career of yours. So much the worse for you! Let me tell you one thing: never enter my house again! It is I who work, it is I who make the money, it is I who pay the bills. It is my home and hereafter you go elsewhere! I will tell our baby that you are dead. Adieu!"

She turned toward the door. There were murmurs of sympathy from every side. The men in their evening clothes who were seated at the tables, rose as she passed and bowed respectfully. But this battle had exhausted all her strength and at the door she fainted. All the women rushed toward her. M. Roland brought vinegar and cold water.

Seated in his chair, Coco had regained his self-possession.

"Excuse me, my dear. This will not occur again," he said, turning to Sonia, and speaking with great dignity.

Tomorrow

But thou, Tomorrow! Never yet was born
In earth's dull atmosphere a thing so fair—
Never yet tripped with footsteps light as air
So glad a vision o'er the hills of morn!
Fresh as the radiant dawning, all unworn
By lightest touch of sorrow or of care,
Thou dost the glory of the morning share
By snowy wings of hope and faith upborne!
O fair Tomorrow! what our souls have missed
Art thou not keeping for us somewhere still?
The buds of promise that have never blown—
The tender lips that we have never kissed—
The song whose high sweet strain eludes our skill—
The one white pearl that life hath never known.

The Savant

By Emilia Pardo Bazan (From the Spanish)

The learned man rose and covered his eyes with his hands; he raised the window, opened the blinds, leaned against the sill and sighed wearily.

Let us explain what sort of learned man this was, since there are many different kinds. He belonged to the species of investigators of detail; his tool was the microscope.

Bent over the lens, he sought out and noted the numberless surprises of the intimate texture of things. What careless mortals see as line, color and form, was for the learned man of my story a very intricate net, a pattern in which are combined the most exact though infinitesimal figures, a marvelous mingling of cells, threads, wheels, points, stars, palms, Grecian frets, fringes, rhombs. Or a tempestuous sea was formed of a drop of blood or a drop of water, in which monsters and hobgoblins, beings which seem engendered of mystery and horror, fight, bring forth and kill in their furious and insane existence of a minute.

For the scientist the glass of his microscope was the altar of truth. Tirelessly he studied and studied, by the light of the sun or of a powerful electric reflector. He hoped to see something which had not been seen before by the army of scientists shut up in other laboratories in great, distant cities, bent over other glasses day and night. Who does not aspire to be alone, to discover his continent? And the scientist plunged eagerly into the invisible waters.

When he was most deeply engrossed in his investigations, he noticed that between the lens and his eyes there seemed to extend a delicate wall. It came and went; it was less than a shadow. As time when on, however, the veil grew thicker, darkened and tarried longer before it faded away. Then it became a dense cloud. The scientist determined to consult another scientist, whose field was the study and cure of defects of vision. The decision of the second scientist was the inevitable one; for science takes no account of the heart's fondest wishes. "Do not work at the microscope," our scientist heard him say, "or you will go blind."

Cruel sentence! For the scientist there was no other world than the world of the microscope. His passion, the whole object of his life, was shut up in the field of those two convex lenses, within whose narrow circumference rioted the impetuous life of organic matter and the rich scheme of inorganic structure. Not work at the microscope? He would die of weariness, his soul would drop to pieces! Besides the tyranny of his dream of an ideal, which is the key to serious and scientific studies, he was driven to the microscope by another tyranny, ever more imperious, the tyranny of custom. And as one yields to a vicious inclination, with furtive step, although he was alone, he placed himself at his table, made his preparations, slid the plate under the object-glass and gave himself blissfully to ardent contemplation of the invisible.

But the cloud came again and covered the field. More imperative than the warning of the oculist, the command of Nature could not be ignored. It was at this moment that the scientist rose, covering his eyes with both hands; he came to the window, opened it, leaned against the sill and sighed wearily.

The cool, fresh air revived him a little. The contraction of his pupils ceased under the influence of the beautiful panorama of the city, surrounded by orchards, gardens, and meadows and watered by a tranquil river, smooth and bright, crystal gray, with many colors sparkling here and there. The distant buildings seemed to float in a fine mist of pearl and silver on a morning cloud-base of delicate vapor. A ray of the sun, striking the spire of a church-tower which bristled with pinnacles and projections turned it for a moment into an arrow of old gold, cutting the soft fog. And the scientist thought in surprise:

"I never saw that before!"

Under the window of the scientist the river was almost motionless. The spring, which had already come, wafted by the bland breezes of April, had bordered the bank with a fringe of cat-tails and blooming lilies, amethyst-color and canary-color. Two white butterflies pursued and sported, flitted and fled, joined at last their delicate bodies of silver plush in the calix of a yellow lily, which did not even bend under their weight. In the current of the river a fish leaped, and the water made little whirlpools that trembled in the sun as they were cut by the glitter from the scales of the trout. And the scientist thought again, astonished: "I never saw that before!"

The McCarthy Program

Though Mayor-elect McCarthy isn't taking many people into his confidence these days rumor has it that he intends to make a pretty clean sweep of municipal office and exercise through men of his own selection every iota of power that the Charter gives him. In getting rid of undesirable commissioners he will follow precedents established by learned and illustrious predecessors who constituted themselves courts of last resort for the determination of the greater good. The Mayor-elect, it is said, believes that one good precedent deserves another, that what yesterday was fact today is doctrine. Examples, in his opinion, justify the most rigorous measures, and he has found many inspiring examples in the records of such eminent public servants as James D. Phelan, the father of the Charter, who conceived his parentage to be the warrant of all his political expedients, and the Hon. Edward Robeson Taylor, one of the Charter builders, a gentleman who has demonstrated that it is susceptible of many interpretations. It was Mayor Taylor, it will be remembered, who got rid of School Director Boyle by adjudging him fatally indiscreet in his loyalty to a fallen friend. Boyle has since been elected to the most important office in the city government by so overwhelming a vote as to indicate a desire on the part of the people to administer a stinging rebuke; and now the question is asked whether under the coming dispensation it will be deemed hazardous for any member of the official family to be seen talking with Fuzzy-Wuzzy.

Job Holders For Life

Mayor-elect McCarthy may do more, I am told, than reorganize the several commissions. It has been suggested to him that he should consider the advisability of testing the constitutionality of the Charter so far as it relates to the Board of Trustees of the Free Library. Under the Charter these trustees are appointed for life. The life term was provided for in the Charter at the instigation of Mr. Phelan, and the section governing the matter was drawn by Mayor Taylor. Phelan and Taylor are now among the trustees, and their associates were appointed by one or the other. So the Free Library is under the management of a very close corporation, and the management is not without a flaw. In the opinion of able attorneys the Charter provision relating to the Free Library is unconstitutional and should be so pronounced by judicial authority.

Anticipating a Crisis

Schoolmaster Joseph O'Connor has vindicated his clairvoyant powers of perception. His resignation from the school board indicates that he perceives the exigencies of a situation that has not yet arisen—the situation that is to grow out of the incoming of Mayor-elect McCarthy and the outgoing of the distinguished champion of correct pronunciation. Perceiving that the situation that is not yet to be descried in the offing is portentous of a crisis in his affairs for which he has no stomach, he streaks it like a red fox for his hole. If he waited to be removed from the school board by the new Mayor he would find reinstatement in the school department impossible, so taking time by the forelock he avails himself of propitious opportunity and gets him back to the old job in the Mission High School where his omnipotence is acknowledged and the busy whisper circling round conveys the dismal tidings when he frowns. This is the same O'Connor who, but a few weeks ago, was preferring groundless charges against School Superintendent Roncovieri in the hope of having him removed from office.

Morals Versus Brains

The inaugural address of the Mayor-elect will be well worth hearing if I am not mistaken; especially so if for the purpose of impressing the Supervisors with the importance of avoiding the errors or worse of their predecessors he takes occasion to dwell upon the costly stupidities of the Taylor administration. The Mayor-elect has kept in close touch with municipal affairs during the past two years, and nothing has amazed him so much as the credulity of the taxpayers as indicated by their apparent confidence in the public servants who were elected to office to clean the Augean stables. If the municipal government has been in honest hands for two years, then, in McCarthy's opinion, the question may well be asked whether the morals of our public servants are not of less importance than their brains. According to Ruef his band of grafters would eat the paint off a house, but according to McCarthy we can afford to have our Supervisors gorge themselves on paint provided it does not develop an appetite for a whole building. He declares that in the history of municipal extravagance (to call it by no harsher name) there is no single transaction that will bear comparison with the transmutation of base metal in the City Hall into coin of the realm by so simple a process as an exchange of ownership.

A Substantial City Haul

After the fire experts estimated that the damage to the City Hall was not more than thirty-five per cent. Estimating upon this basis, the so-called ruin, considering the original cost, was worth not less than four and a half million dollars. Now instead of doing as was done in the case of the Girls' High School, that is, advertising for bids for the material, the Supervisors called for bids on a contract for the demolition of the building and the removal of all material, and they awarded the contract to the men who agreed to do the work for the smallest sum. Under this contract all the material in the building—hundreds of tons of steel, thousands of pounds of copper, and millions of brick—became the property of the men who were paid by the city to take it away. McCarthy, I am told, has made a pretty accurate estimate of the enormous profits of this contract. One item will suffice to indicate how profitable it was. The man who had charge of the work of tearing down the dome, had several thousands of dollars worth of copper ready for shipment after the expenditure of eighty-five dollars for labor.

Bore (who has already wearied the guests with many songs)—Now I will sing one more song and then go home.

Hostess—Pardon me, but do you attach much importance to the order of your program?

The Nicaraguan Affair

When President Zelaya of Nicaragua ordered the execution of two Americans for participating in the latest Central American hullabaloo he supplied this country with a pretext for taking a hand in his affairs, and that was just what our State Department wanted. Our statesmen at Washington affected great indignation when they learned that Leroy Cannon and Leonard Grace, American citizens, had been put to death, but the question that naturally presents itself is, What right had they to participate in hostilities against the de facto Government of the country in which they were living? They were under the protection of the laws of that country, and they were caught in arms against the regime from which they derived such rights as they exercised. It is said that there were extenuating circumstance, but the truth with reference to our hurried interference, in all probability, is that our officials are decidedly prejudiced against Zelaya and have been eager for an opportunity to assist in reforming the Government of Nicaragua. Zelaya is a very troublesome person, and recent diplomatic relations between Nicaragua and the United States have been far from cordial. Indeed Zelaya has made it so unpleasant for the American Minister to Nicaragua that the last representative there from this country, John Gardner Coolidge of Massachusetts, resigned from the diplomatic service in order to be able to get away from the "intolerable conditions" in Managua. After his departure last winter the post was vacant a few weeks and John H. Gregory Jr., Secretary and Charge d'Affaires of the legation there was ordered to Washington, leaving the diplomatic establishment at Managua vacant. Mr. Coolidge's official despatches, it was said, were tampered with by the Nicaraguan Government.

He's a Mischiefmaker

For many months the State Department has desired to eliminate Zelaya from Central American politics. He has not only been obnoxious to the United States and its diplomatic representative in Managua but has been regarded by the officers of the State Department as a political mischiefmaker. He has been charged with instigating revolutionary movements against neighboring republics, with violating the agreement of the Central American peace conference held in Washington in 1907, and with scheming to elevate himself to a dominating political position in Central American politics. In addition he has endeavored to wreck the Central American Court of Justice at Cartago, Costa Rica, officials say, because it rendered a decision against him. He was prevented from accomplishing this purpose by the United States and Mexico.

Mrs. Parvenue (indicating a painting of the Madonna)—Whose picture is that, sir?"

Mrs. Parvenue (surprised)—Are you sure? I have always supposed that Raphael was a man.

A Promising Young Plunger

I saw young Clarence McCornick about town last week. Perhaps you have never heard of Clarence McCornick, but unless I am very badly mistaken his name will be as well known as that of Gates, Patten and other celebrated plungers before many years pass by. Clarence McCornick is the young son of a very wealthy Salt Lake banker, and about two years ago he gave his father much pain by developing a penchant for plunging in the stock market. McCornick pere had his own ideas about that form of gambling, but when his son, in less than two years, converted a "shoestring" into two million dollars of cold cash, he was forced to admit that even gambling had its peculiar charm. Young McCornick is still playing the game, being at the present moment interested in cotton to the extent of about $800,000. I don't know whether you are aware that some very tidy fortunes have been made by speculators in cotton during the past few months. McCornick is still holding on for bigger returns and his past performances augur well for his success this time. When the big takings in cotton are chronicled you are quite apt to see McCornick's name in the Abou Ben Adhem position. Young McCormick is quite well known in this city. He is a handsome athletic chap, very popular with the ladies and a generous spender. If he doesn't make his mark in Wall street and elsewhere I will concede that I deserve to have the usual fate of prophets meted out to me.

He's Not a Plagiarist

Last week I took occasion to protest against the lampooning of that distinguished public spirited citizen, the Hon. James D. Phelan. Now I feel myself constrained to anticipate unjust criticism of him with reference to the sentiments which he expressed in the columns of the Examiner on Thanksgiving Day. Some of those sentiments, I fear, he has been suspected of having borrowed, and I will be astonished if somebody does not charge him with plagiarism. There is no charge more frequently made with injustice, for innocent plagiarism is occurring every day, the reason being that honest thinkers are always stealing unconsciously from each other. It often happens, as Oliver Wendell Holmes has somewhere said, that remembered ideas taking advantage of a crowd of thoughts smuggle themselves in as original. This in all probability has been the case with Mr. Phelan. Take for example this sentiment: "While the Thanksgiving dinner of some shall be the bitter drippings from the shambles of corruption, I am thankful for the nourishment I receive from my optimism and my patriotism." Here is a perfect specimen of those literary coincidences which are taken for plagiarisms. Mr. Phelan reads the bible from which he absorbed the foregoing sentiment, but when he gave utterance to it he was not mindful of the author by whom it had been supplied. It is to be found in the parable of the Pharisee and the publican. "The Pharisee," St. Luke tells us, "stood and prayed thus with himself, God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican." What a striking resemblance between the two pictures—that of Mr.

Phelan priding himself on his civic virtue and on his being different from other citizens, and that of the Pharisee exulting in his freedom from certain sins and in his being superior to the poor publican who would not lift up so much as his eyes to heaven, but smote upon his breast saying, God be merciful to me a sinner. But let it not be supposed that Mr. Phelan is a plagiarist. He is merely a Pharisee.

The Loquacious Wheeler

The certain kind of wit that is required to play the fool President Benjamin Ide Wheeler has in abundance, but if it be true that people have no right to make fools of themselves unless they have no relations to blush for them, the distinguished President of the University of California should be immediately recalled from Berlin where he is blundering on in a way that has set the whole Berkeley faculty in a glow. The latest news from Berlin is that the holder of the Roosevelt professorship has been giving the Germans another taste of his provincialism by saying disagreeable things about Great Britain and Britishers. Now Dr. Wheeler occupies in Berlin a quasi-official position. The professorship which he holds was given him by the President of the United States, and, to say the least, it is in very bad taste for him to indulge publicly in remarks offensive to a people with whom we are on the most friendly terms. His conduct is of course very much more reprehensible than was that of our other noteworthy tonguester, David Starr Jordan, when that gentleman took occasion to libel the people of France, for Jordan occupied no official position. Jordan and Wheeler, by the way, suffer from the same incurable disease—loquacity. They love to hear themselves talk. Both are next of kin to Mr. Prate-apace. Classic scholars of prodigious learning, they are nevertheless singularly unmindful of Socrates' tip, "Nature has given us two ears, two eyes and but one tongue, to the end that we should hear and see more than we speak." With all their book knowledge they are not wise enough to hold their tongue. If they opened their purse with no greater caution than they open their mouth they'd be paupers forever.

"Mamma, today the teacher talked to me quite alone."
"Well, my boy, and what did he say to you?"
"He asked if I had any brothers and sisters."
"And what did he say when you told him that you are our only child?"
"He said: 'God be praised!'"

Crocker Discusses Home Affairs

William H. Crocker, the most enterprising of all our financiers and the man who has done more than all others to rehabilitate the city, arrived in New York from Europe last week, and was interviewed by a reporter of the Sun. "He was jubilant," says the reporter, "over the recent defeat of the so-called reform element in his home city." He was quoted as follows: "I was pleased to see Heney defeated and by such a hearty vote. The people of San Francisco don't approve of his methods and what he represents. Now everything will be quiet and peaceful. The original graft trials were all right, but lately prosecutions have been conducted largely for the personal gratification of Heney and Spreckels. San Francisco is all right. Business conditions are splendid. There was only one thing necessary to restore full confidence and that was to get rid of the graft prosecution element. Now that that has been removed by the election everybody is happy."

Judge Coffey's Decisions

From the literary reviewer of one of the morning papers I learn that two more volumes of Judge Coffey's probate decisions are just hot off the press. Judge Coffey occupies among authors a strategic position that ought to arouse the envy of those who find difficulty in making their books sell. Every lawyer who practices in Judge Coffey's department of the superior court feels it incumbent upon him to purchase a copy of these decisions. Despite many stories and rumors to the contrary Judge Coffey is a very human bencher and to convey to him that one has read, pondered and inwardly digested his juridical pronunciamentos is to find the royal road to his approbation. Hence there is quite a scramble among the lawyers to acquire and consult the recently issued volumes. I understand that some have even appeared in Judge Coffey's courtroom with the volumes conspicuously displayed among their law books and I know no reason why young attorneys, anxious to win their maiden cases, should not commit pages of these decisions to heart and recite them, with due credit to the learning and insight of the author, in the course of their argumentations before His Honor. Of course a great many of Judge Coffey's decisions have been reversed by the higher courts, but that is the common lot of the jurists who sit in the lower tribunals and if it has happened to Judge Coffey somewhat more frequently than to other judges of the superior bench, that is doubtless because he has decided more cases than they. The new volumes have been edited by one of the judge's nephews, so the most sympathetic treatment of the judge's decisions is assured. To Judge Coffey's nephews Judge Coffey is Sir Oracle and when he opens his mouth it is not for them to dispute his large and dogmatic utterances.

St. Francis in the Role of a Pirate

In the politics of the Richmond side of the thirty-ninth district Abe Friedlander is conspicuous if not distinguished. His voice is loud, his manner unabashed, his flow of language unceasing and the matter of his eloquence invariably original. Not so long ago he startled a meeting called in the interests of Byron Mauzy, candidate for the republican nomination for mayor, by an impassioned tribute to the republicanism of Abe Ruef. Not to know Abe Friedlander argues oneself unknown. So at least think many residents of Richmond, among them the descendants of the famous Arguello whose deeds are part of our early history. So when the Board of Supervisors showed symptoms of erasing their patronymic from the list of new street names for the Richmond district, the descendants of the old Spaniard retained Abe Friedlander to present their cause to the city fathers. Abe Friedlander was just the man for the job. List, gentle reader, to his plea: "They have called this great man a cut-throat and a pirate," quoth Abe, "and now they want to substitute for his name that of St. Francis. Let me tell you, a greater pirate than St. Francis never sailed the seas." Amazement was depicted on the mobile faces of the supervisors and consternation darkened the countenances of the Arguello descendants. Abe felt that he had made a mistake, but was equal to the emergency. "Of course I refer to St. Francis Drake," he explained. Whereat there was tumultuous laughter and the descendants of Arguello offered to the offended patron saint of our fair city a prayer that they might be delivered from their friend Abe Friedlander.

Bret Harte Comes Back to Life

But Abe Friedlander is not alone in his imperfect mastery of San Francisco history. He has a very distinguished companion in ignorance in the person of L. M. King, the secretary of our Merchants' Association. Now the Merchants' Association knows all about this city, its past, present and future. It fairly bulges with information on all sorts of topics relating to San Francisco, running the California Promotion Association a close race for priority in this department of learning. But Mr. King has not kept pace with the very latest events in local annals. I should judge that his perfect familiarity with San Francisco history stops short at the year 1902. At any rate that was the year in which Bret Harte died and L. M. King learned the other day, for the first time, that the great California stylist was no more. It was at a meeting of the committee which has in charge the big banquet with which the opening of the Palace Hotel is to be signalized that King made this amazing discovery. With the proud air of one imparting a valuable suggestion King proposed that Bret Harte be induced to write a poem for that great occasion. Delicately yet decisively it was conveyed to Mr. King that Bret Harte had some time since departed this life. It must have been a great shock to King. I am told that the spectacle of Mark Twain weeping at the grave of Adam was as nothing to the exhibition of grief given by King when he learned that Bret Harte had died. I believe that King's mind held the idea that the poem, "Serene, indifferent to fate," had been composed by Bret Harte for the occasion of the Portola celebration. At any rate one of the banquet committeemen told me that King came to him privately and proposed that a floral piece be sent to Bret Harte's funeral. But perhaps this committeeman was poking fun at Mr. King.

A Good California School History

An editorial appeared in Town Talk recently in which the neglect of California history in the schools of the State was deplored. This has cause P. S. Woolsey, the local agent of the American Book Company, to forward to this office a school history of California which, he states, is widely used in the sixth grade of the public schools throughout the State, principally as a supplementary reading text. The book is by Helen Elliott Bandini and a hasty glance through its pages gives the impression that it is a very meritorious publication. I do not know how long it has been in use and regret very much that so good a text book should have crept so noiselessly into the schools. I think that many adults would be glad to read it if they knew of its existence. Mrs. Bandini, in her preface, states that she has confined herself almost entirely to source materials and that her connection with the old Spanish families has given her unusual advantages for the study of old manuscripts and the gathering of recollections of historical events from the lips of aged Spanish residents. She acknowledges the assistance given her by Professor Morse Stephens, Charles F. Lummis and other competent authorities. The book is written in an easy colloquial style which should commend it to children but which has its disadvantages. For instance, Mrs. Bandini quotes: "Sir Francis Drake," says the old chronicle, "was the first Englishman to sail on the back side of America." That is very expressive, no doubt, but it is sure to call forth a titter from sixth grade pupils which cannot be good for discipline and must be rather embarrassing to the teacher.

Olympians Are Out of the Hole

The Olympic Club financial problem has been solved, and the Olympians now regard their energetic and tireless president, William F. Humphrey, as a "wiz." He has certainly proved himself a financial genius in the handling of the problem with which he was confronted when he took charge of the hole that was bored in Post street by his predecessor. The only satisfactory explanation that has ever been given of that hole is that the inspiration of it was born of the suspicion that there was an oil gusher somewhere between here and China. The club was certainly in a very deep hole, so deep that it was gravely suggested that the only way out was via the bankruptcy route. But Humphrey had confidence in the club pride that animates the Olympians, and he has succeeded in extricating them from the depths, and by clever management he has put a good round sum in five figures on the right side of the ledger. Work has already been started on the new building, which is to be a Class A structure, and which is to cost $500,000. It will be the most completely equipped and sumptuously appointed club-house in the United States, and architectually the building will surpass in every respect every other club building in this city. Among the members of no other club is there to be found so much enthusiasm, so much of what Dr. Johnson calls "clubableness" as among the Olympians. To get a loan of $300,000 it was necessary for the members to subscribe for $200,000 worth of second mortgage bonds, and though not more than half of the members have been approached nearly the full amount is already guaranteed. Subscriptions were obtained in the Olympic Club far more rapidly than in the Bohemian which has a far wealthier lot of members. The Bohemians, by the way, are putting up a Class C building at Post and Taylor, alongside the Olympic Club lot, and the Olympians, as they look through the windows of their temporary shack on the pile of brick and wood going up on the corner indulge in some very sarcastic remarks about the decidedly flimsy structure. One of them remarked the other day that Mr. C. F. Richardson, the sire of the Bohemian Club's autumn jinks, held last week, came pretty near the truth when he broke into verse at the close of the clever invitation which he addressed to the members. These are the lines:

TIMGAD, THE EXCAVATED ROMAN CITY OF AFRICA

Then come and bring your care-free smile;
Lay by your frown and scowl;
For the Owl has "got" the spider
And the hook-worm's got the owl.

McKee Rankin's Ill Luck

I notice that Nance O'Neil has won out in the injunction proceedings initiated by the Shuberts to prevent her from joining the forces of David Belasco. The California actress was under contract with the Shuberts for two seasons of fifteen and twenty weeks each but the play in which she was featured was withdrawn after eight weeks and when David Belasco asked her to join the brilliant company which he is assembling for the no-star experiment which he will undertake in his two big New York playhouses, she accepted the offer. All of which reminds me that McKee Rankin is one of the most unlucky men in the world. Rankin, as everybody knows, taught Nance O'Neil how to act and managed all her starring ventures, with what financial losses nobody need be reminded. Year after year Rankin kept Nance O'Neil before the public in big plays, and the strength of his determination to force recognition for her great abilities started the idle story that he exercised a hypnotic influence over the beautiful young woman. But it was not hypnotism; it was simply his deep conviction that Nance O'Neil was fitted temperamentally and physically to be a great tragedienne. McKee Rankin, though a poor manager, is a great actor and America has at last come to realize that his judgment of Nance O'Neil was correct. But now that she has obtained the recognition of Broadway and is being fought for by rival managers, where is McKee Rankin? The veteran actor no longer manages his old pupil. The broadening of her career has thrust him into the background and other managers will reap the golden harvest of Miss O'Neil's success. It is mighty hard luck, to be sure, but I do not think that Nance O'Neil is open to the charge of ingratitude. She stayed with McKee Rankin loyally through the dark years when perhaps she might have gained much by deserting him.

The Cocktail Route

"What has become of the old cocktail route?" was the question asked the other day by a visitor from the East who was reminiscencing on the subject of the things that contributed to the individuality of the City that Was in the days when he enjoyed periodical trips to the coast. The men to whom the question was addressed had forgotten about the famous cocktail route along which they had paraded in their younger days, the route that was marked by a string of saloons extending from Gobey's on Sutter street above Kearny along Kearny to Market and out Market to Farley's "Reception" at the gore of Market and Ellis. The cocktail route was famous the world over. Men of international repute had voyaged along that route, viewing the more or less famous paintings that adorned the walls of the ornate temples of Bacchus, and enthusing over the workmanship of polite mixologists, skilled in the art of concocting seductive combinations of hard liquor and pungent bitters. The cocktail route has passed into tradition. Saloons still thrive along the highway, but men about town no longer start out deliberately to make a tour of them and while away the late hours of the afternoon assimilating wet goods of sundry brands. The gay bohemian of other days is no longer on terms of intimacy with saloon barkeepers. Saloons are now supported by an element much less fastidious than that which sauntered over the old cocktail route. Nowadays the flame of conviviality is fanned with the wing of

The Importance of Pearl Harbor

It must be gratifying to all Americans who are cognizant of the importance of American supremacy in the Pacific Ocean to know that this government has at last undertaken the fortification of Pearl Harbor in the Hawaiian Islands. This harbor has been aptly called the "crossways of the Pacific" on account of its position and the naval strategists of the world have for many years realized its commanding importance. Although Pearl Harbor has been in the possession of the United States for more than eleven years its improvement has been so completely neglected that the American fleet on its cruise around the world was unable to pass through the channel, simply because a little dredging entailing slight expense, had not been done. Now that the report calling for the clearing of the channel and the fortification of the harbor has been approved by President Taft, it is to be hoped that the work will be pushed as rapidly as possible. Pearl Harbor has been described as a magnificent harbor, completely landlocked and capable in extent and in depth of water of giving anchorage to as large a fleet as is ever collected in one place. The approach is by a somewhat narrow channel capable of impregnable fortification. There is a coral reef bar across the entrance to the harbor, but a natural channel exists, piercing the reef at the entrance and filled only with an accumulation of soft coral or coral sand which can easily be removed, thus making the harbor accessible to the largest vessels at a comparatively small expense. For many years Great Britain had a covetous eye on Pearl Harbor but her last hope of acquiring it died when the islands were annexed to the United States. It is the manifest duty of Congress to lose no time in making of this splendid harbor the great naval base which the United States imperatively requires in the Pacific.

The Wells Fargo Melon

New York financiers recently awakened to the fact that Wells Fargo & Co. is one of the most prosperous corporations in the country. A few weeks ago the directors of the company cut the richest melon in Wall street history. It had a cash value of $100 a share and in addition rights to take new stock. These rights were estimated at above $135 a share and some of the estimates ran about $200. There were no transactions in the dividend, for the stock is closely held and seldom sold, but it has been estimated at as high as $500 a share. The company has $8,000,000 stock outstanding and earned 58 per cent on it according to the last annual report. Although the company reported annually very remunerative earnings it could not be induced to pay in dividends an amount commensurate with those earnings. Three years ago minority stockholders organized and endeavored to force an increased disbursement. They showed that the company had a surplus twice as great as its capital stock of $8,000,000, but at the annual meeting were rebuffed in a speech by William Nelson Cromwell, in which he let fall the remark that "Mr. Harriman moves in an upper world where stockholders may not enter." In the course of this 1906 fight for control the stock advanced from 233 to 305. Southern Pacific, controlled by Mr. Harriman, owned a fifth of the stock, and the Harriman party bought in so heavily as to produce the gain of more than seventy points in market price. The more substantial stockholders, notably such men as Admiral Brownson, voted with the Harriman party, and the minority holders were defeated. Since then the figures have told the story. The last figures, contained in an annual report issued six weeks ago, showed earnings of 58 per cent on the capital stock. The same report showed possession of $17,165,000 invested in loans and $5,460,000 cash in bank. The stock advanced more than $100 a share in one day after this annual report came out. It sold at 514½ one day two weeks ago. Wells Fargo started in business on this coast as the "pony express" and in early days its stamps used to go as Government stamps. It carried the gold from the mines and insured its packages against highway robbery and every other chance of loss.

San Francisco His Starting Point

Captain Roald Amundsen, the explorer, who discovered the Northwest Passage in the little sloop Gjoa which he presented to this city and which is now in Golden Gate Park, has returned to this country to make preparations for another voyage to the Arctic. The Norwegian Government is fitting out the historic ship Fram for him. He will start from Christina in July, 1910, and come to this city via Cape Horn to get his supplies for the voyage. It is his intention to drift over the Arctic Ocean with the ice and he expects to strike land in about four years. Discussing the expedition the other day, he said: "We shall naturally take all kinds of scientific observations as we drift along, for I must point out that this expedition has no ambition in the way of breaking records or getting to the North Pole. We are out to pursue scientific investigations in those little known regions, and although I should naturally have liked to reach the Pole first, provided we had drifted within a convenient distance of it, this question is, especially now after the discovery of the Pole, of secondary importance. Nevertheless, we shall take dogs and sledges with us all the way from Norway. The dogs will come on board a Danish Government steamer from Greenland next summer, from the northwestern settlements of Greenland. It so happens that the steamer which will bring the dogs is the same which brought Dr. Cook to Copenhagen, the Hans Egede."

His Opinion of Cook

Captain Amundsen was induced to talk on the subject of the Cook-Peary controversy. Dr. Cook was with him on the Belgica antarctic expedition of 1897-99. "Of all men I have known," said Amundsen, "Cook stands alone as the most courageous, practical, modest and self sacrificing. You should have seen him direct the work when we cut the Belgica out of the antarctic ice. The ship was entirely surrounded. The food was giving out and we were all more or less sick. About a thousand yards from the spot where we were imprisoned by what I should term a sort of lazy pack ice a small spot of water was discovered. Cook said that we should have to saw a channel for the ship and get our vessel there, for that would be our only road to salvation. Through some ingenious method of his own we succeeded after many days of hard work. It may be said, in a measure, that he saved our lives, for not only did he scheme for all of us in order to get us out but he inspired everybody with his inexhaustible energy. I know him, for did I not pass two long years in his company, day in, day out? The same kind of testimony I give about Cook can be had from every one of the seventeen on board the Belgica. Then comes Cook's claim of having been first to reach the North Pole. I have not seen Cook's data and observations, and I consequently will not judge or pass an opinion one way or the other. This will be the work and the responsibility of that scientific body to which Cook submits his data—the venerable University of Copenhagen. When the Danish scientists have passed judgment we who have had no access to the observations will have time enough to start talking and, perhaps, quarreling. Under no circumstances would I take it upon myself, as I am told certain gentlemen here have done, to stand up and denounce Cook even if I had a feeling that he was wrong."

A National Labor Party

From seemingly reliable sources I learn that the gentlemen who have just won a sweeping victory in the municipal election plan the formation of a national labor party. I have been told that when the State Building Trades Convention meets in January the foundation of this ambitious scheme will be laid by systematic industrial organization of the entire State. It is conceded by all who keep their fingers on the political pulse that union labor will play an important part in the coming State election. Even now the bosses of the republican and democratic parties are bending every energy to the delicate task of enlisting labor's support for their candidates. But I am very badly mistaken if P. H. McCarthy and his associates have any intention of pulling chestnuts out of the fire for the republican or democratic leaders. They are quite capable of making their own plans and they have splendidly equipped agencies for carrying them out. To inaugurate a movement for the formation of a national labor party would serve the purpose of facilitating the organization of the State on union labor lines as well as of enlisting the support of labor leaders outside of California. Nowhere in this country is organized labor of such political importance as in California and labor leaders with political ambition are always watching the signs here. One of the signs was given in a recent issue of Organized Labor, the official organ of the Building Trades Council. Here are a few sentences culled from the leading editorial: "At present and for the past few months, the social evolution appears to be moving with mighty strides. The unrest of the lower strata of society—the foundation that carries the entire structure with its heavy burden of ornamental and useless figures—has been groaning for centuries under the load. . . . The time for a third party—a national labor party—is here. The crop that has been sown on thousands of industrial battlefields is ripe and ready for harvest. . . . We must have men in the Mayor's, Governor's and President's chair. . . . What the American Federation should do, and every central labor body in all the big industrial centers and cities throughout the land, is to get ready their union labor party and elect their men at the elections. San Francisco has blazed the way."

Poet Watson in a New Role

William Watson has not been silent in the hubbub caused by the publication of his poem of invective, "The Woman With the Serpent's Tongue." He has allowed himself to be questioned on the subject of the identity of this woman and has not denied that he referred to a living personage of London society. Of course Watson has named no names, but he has gone so far as to say that the lady who has been most frequently mentioned as the object of his attack has been spoken of as the only true and original serpent-tongued in the House of Commons and in the drawings rooms of two cabinet ministers.

THE NEW MORRIS MUSIC HALL

Which will be erected on the north side of Ellis street between Stockton and Powell. The Morris music halls book attractions of the first class and when this new amusement home is opened the Orpheum will be confronted for the first time with a formidable rival.

This of course, as pointed out in Town Talk several weeks ago, is Mrs. Herbert Asquith, wife of the prime minister of Great Britain. Watson also admits that he knows the family to which she belongs and he further says that he has heard things said in this woman's house which startled him exceedingly. And to cap the climax Watson declares that while he will not repeat these things at the present time, he may some day give them to the world, having kept a record of them. This, I take it, shows the poet Watson in a new role. His admirers can never have suspected him of being a chronicler of small beer, but he admits that he has jotted down the softly-spoken scandals of the tea table and has filed them away for future reference. It is not a pretty confession for a great poet to make; it shows him in any but the heroic light. Surely it is a breach of hospitality not even to be excused on the ground of poetic license thus to keep tab on the inconsequential chatter of a drawing room in which one is an honored guest.

London Society in a Flutter

Watson's announcement has caused considerable consternation. London society had not nearly recovered from the shock of the Countess of Cardigan's outrageous memoirs when this bomb was exploded by William Watson. It does not mend matters to reflect that seventeen prominent women have been mentioned as the "woman with the serpent's tongue." London is prolific, it seems, in dames who sharpen their spite on the reputations of their acquaintances and although it is pretty generally conceded that Mrs. Asquith is the woman on whom the poet has been "keeping cases," still there is room for doubt and nobody can say just whose scandal-mongering sallies he is thinking of making public. It is not a pleasant situation at all. Imagine how our fashionables would feel if one of our lionized versemiths should announce, quite nonchalantly, that he had kept a dairy of all the mean things he had heard in Burlingame or Broadway and that he was thinking of publishing them. Can't you name a few dowagers, aye and a few demure belles, who would pale with apprehension? Well, that is the way Watson has affected London society. He looms up as a figure of horrible possibilities.

Scientific Work in the Philippines

Few Americans appreciate the amount of scientific investigation which has been prosecuted in the Philippines since they passed out of the control of Spain. The insular government has made wonderful progress in mapping and surveying the principal islands of the group and has accumulated a mass of data bearing on their agricultural and mineral values, their meteorological conditions and their natural history. A great deal of similar work was done by the Spaniards but although it was systematic and thorough, it proceeded slowly. The religious orders are credited with most of the pioneering in the rich scientific field of the innumerable islands, the Franciscans, Dominicans, Augustinians, Recolets, Capuchins and Jesuits having been particularly active. Of the work of the Jesuits Warren D. Smith, chief of the Division of Mines, had this to say in a recent article on the subject: "For a long time we were indebted to this body for almost all the reliable information regarding the mysterious and wild island of Mindanao, which had been practically under their entire control for years. When the American government came to take an inventory of its new possessions the Jesuits had a large collection of maps of the islands." Some of these religious investigators, according to Smith, deserve to be remembered among the great explorers of the century.

The Extent of the Explorations

Engaged in the work of exploration under American auspices are the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Army, the Bureau of Constabulary, the Bureau of Lands, and the Division of Mines of the Bureau of Science. The Coast and Geodetic Survey alone employs five steamers and one launch with 284 officers and men, besides an office force of draughtsmen in Manila. Their work is to make soundings and charts in the 585,960 square miles of water in the boundaries of the archipelago. The Bureau of Lands makes cadastral surveys and is going over the great estates known as the Friar lands. In three years one party from this bureau went over 470 miles of rivers and trails, sketched 620 square miles of topography and established 1739 elevations. The army has penetrated into the heart of Mindanao where the savages are continually on the war path, and has mapped many districts of Leyte, Cebu, Panay and Luzon, for even in this last island there are regions which are entirely unknown. A bureau of scientists is collecting data about ethnology, botany, ornithology, biology and the fisheries. Mineral lands are being prospected and the geology of the islands is being carefully studied. On all of these subjects the government regularly publishes reports, but few Americans except scientific specialists ever read them, so the magnitude of the achievement of the United States is not generally known or appreciated. Already the sum of accomplishment is far in excess of that under three centuries of Spanish rule. America is doing much for the islands, but from a scientific viewpoint the islands are doing just as much for Americans.

Delmas Interviewed in London

During the Steinheil trial in Paris Mr. D. M. Delmas arrived in London and he was immediately sought out by the newspapers and interviewed as to what he thought of French methods of criminal prosecution. The London papers alluded to him as "the distinguished American advocate who defended Harry Thaw," and they published pictures of him and gave a great deal of space to his utterances which were cabled to Paris and printed in the leading journals of that city. The most interesting of the interviews with Mr. Delmas appeared in the London Daily Mirror. To a reporter of that journal he said: "Treating the question of Mme. Steinheil's guilt or innocence as a moot point, it seems to me that all the evidence so far adduced does not place her guilt of the terrible crimes of which she is accused beyond all reasonable doubt. If the case were being tried in America or England I think that it would be considered that Mme. Steinheil should be given that beneficent benefit of the doubt which prevents the punishment of the innocent if it sometimes enables the guilty to escape. It is difficult for a man trained under one system of jurisprudence, whose rules have been woven into the texture of his mind as though they were eternal verities, to express an opinion upon another totally different system. It seems to me that lawyers who have been bred and educated entirely under the Common Law system, and who, perhaps, have not even an acquaintance with the French language, let alone with French jurisprudence—it seems to me a little extraordinary, if not unjust, that they should undertake offhand to pronounce such condemnatory judgments upon French methods as it would seem many of them have done. It is to be noted that the few among those lawyers who have an acquaintance with French jurisprudence and the procedure in French courts have been much more moderate, and doubtless more just, in their appreciation of French law. One should not overlook the fact that many of our rules of evidence, whilst intended as helps to ascertain the truth, very often prove insuperable obstacles to the attainment of that object. I was very much struck this morning to find that certain witnesses—and one of them, at least, related to the defendant—were asked their opinions as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant. A question like that is calculated to startle an English or American lawyer, and probably there is not a respectable member of the Bar in either country who would venture to put such a question. And probably there is not a judge in either country who, if such a question were put, would not reprove the absurdity of it. Yet such questions as that are asked in the course of the French trial without any objection and as a matter of course. Well, now, is it after all certain that the deliberate and candid opinion, assuming it to be perfectly honest, of a man who from long acquaintance has knowledge of a thousand and one minute circumstances and impressions bearing upon the character of the defendant should be regarded as of no value in a juridical investigation of this character? We in America and you in England say unhesitatingly that they are of no value whatever. But the French think dmerently. To administer law in France as it is administered in England or the United States would require almost another revolution, certainly a revolution in the national character. I do not think any such rapid, violent changes are about to take place in the French system as some reports in the press would seem to indicate. Changes have been made in your jurisprudence here and in the constitution of your courts, but they have been made slowly and conservatively. As events show that certain things can be improved they are improved. Conservatism of Bench and Bar makes such improvements slow and gradual, but it is proper that they should be slow."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy.

Stocks—The erratic course of the market during the recent week may be ascribed to the operations of bankers who have given support on weak spots and sold on the advances. It appears that stability in the general list was the chief factor and that no marked trend was desired in either direction. The chief factor and matter of interest to the financial and business world at the moment is the assembling of Congress on December 5 and the position that President Taft will take on pending legislation and the possibility of amending the Sherman Act. These matters are vital to the business community and the future of the security values is dependent on the utterances of the President. The sharp break in stocks at the close of the week looks like banking manipulation to clear the market of weak speculative accounts and to prepare for anything unfavorable in Washington later. Under the circumstances we feel like advising the purchase of stocks on weak spots only.

Grain—The December bulls in control of the option have apparently switched to May and the spread has practically disappeared. It may be assumed that there will be no further effort by the old crowd to congest December, though a heavy short selling may develop another twist. There has been a slight increase in spring wheat shipments though the volume coming forward is offset by a smaller winter wheat movement than a year ago. The high prices for ten days have brought out the enlarged spring shipments but have had no effect in the winter belt. It begins to look as if the winter region was pretty well cleaned up and there is a firm holding of red winter which still maintains 1.20 at Chicago. Every week develops the assumption that the wheat crop has been over-estimated and favors buyers of May. The decrease in the visible will put the total on January 1 the smallest in fifteen years which will offset all European and new crop influences. There is likely to be a break in prices around December 8 as the government report on winter seeding will show the heaviest acreage in three years with a condition over 90 per cent. After that period the market will waver until the final report of this year's crop on December 15. Until that time the movements should be within small range with excellent scalping chances. The weather in the corn belt continues unfavorable. South of the Lakes there is no frost in the ground and corn has not cured. There is a good shipping movement for immediate consumption of the damp corn. Nine-tenths coming to the markets is on sample; in fact only old corn is being shipped to grade. The delay in getting contract into the markets is becoming a source of worry. The past week the chief corn bear has been selling December, of which he is heavily short and buying May, presumbaly to cause a break in December to let him out. The buyers have been largely the country people who are trading on exact knowledge. There is a feeling among some Chicago observers that a desperate effort will be made next week to break December by delivering all the 500,000 contract in public and private elevators and making the deliveries to the small holders. It would weaken the market, but would bring in a flood of buyers in addition to covering shorts on account of the houses delivering.

Cotton—During the past week the market has received less speculative support and according to reports there was less inquiry for spots in the interior, yet values came within a few points of touching the highest levels reached thus far this season, and the net result of the week's trading shows no appreciable change compared with one week ago, longs having had a little the better of the argument. The general freeze and light receipts more than offset the bearish theories advanced by shorts. The world has been waiting for facts, and will now be supplied with an abundance of testimony of a silent character favorable to the long side of the market. There is said to be no demand for spot cotton; still exports from the United States, the past week were 228,600 bales, (last year 216,436), and spinners' takings were 353,000. Since September 1 exports were 2,993,000 bales, (last year 2,846,000), spinners' takings 3,329,000, (last year 3,280,-000) bales or 49,000 more than to this date one year ago, when takings by the world amounted to 13,346,000 bales and actual consumption, 13,157,000 bales. Exports from America to Europe last season were 8,449,049 bales, the largest on record, yet shipments thus far to Europe are 147,000 bales larger than one year ago. The United States will need about 5,000,000 bales for home consumption, and if the crop be not more than 11,000,000 bales, America will not be able to spare more than about 6,000,000 bales. Realizing the acuteness of the situation foreign spinners, although preaching short time, have bought more freely of American cotton to date than ever before and at prices higher for this time of the season than for 35 years. We reiterate that the smallness of receipts of late and indicated for the future, are due more to stocks nearing exhaustion in the Valley and in the Southwest than to the lack of a demand for cotton. We see no excuse for even a temporary decline, the heavy sales which have taken place in the last three weeks having placed business on a much safer and healthier basis and deprived the market of the probability of any sudden and wide fluctuations. We expect the market to gradually advance to a higher level of values led by spots in the future, just as it has been in the past, without any sensational moves either way.

Copper—The firmness of the standard coppers during the recent big break shows that these subsidiary companies know where they are at in the formation of the big merger. As settled now the merger will control one billion pounds of copper metal manufactured annually, which is about 80 per cent of the present output. The Leake companies will not go in, so the merger will not be held in restraint of trade. Owing to the uncertainties of the Standard Oil decision stocks in all companies have fallen but shares in the Standard Copper stocks are all right either in or out of the merger. Nevada Cons., Butte Coalition, Ray Cons., Miami Giroux Cons., should all be bought on this break.

continued very active for the past week or so, the principal trading and almost half of the business has been in Spring Valley Water and Associated Oil. The former stock has had some heavy buying from very influential sources and has advanced to record prices. Of course the bait that is attracting most of the buyers of this stock is the negotiations that the Water Company has entered into with the municipality regarding the purchase of the Spring Valley plant. Associated Oil stock has had the best buying of any stock on the list and while nothing official has been given out on it, rumors are becoming thicker and thicker of early dividends from the Oil Company and these rumors are being generally believed. The power stock group continues to draw some little attention and City Electric and Northern California Power are at present selling at high record prices. Alaska Packers, for no apparent reason, turned very weak and sold off a couple of points, but at the present writing it is in demand once more and fast recovering in value. Hawaiian sugar stocks have rather quieted down in point of activity but this division, due to the strong raw sugar situation, is holding very firm. Pacific Telephone and Pacific Gas and Electric stocks continue to follow the general tone of the New York Stock Market and have shown but little change. Bond trading has lately been of very large proportions, the principal activity and advances being in Associated Oil 5s, City Electric 5s, Pacific Telephone 5s, People's Water 5s, San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley 5s, Southern Pacific of California 1912, 6s, Southern Pacific refunding 4s, Spring Valley Water 4s and United Railroads 4s. Other bonds, taken generally, are quiet but firm. For the immediate future it is said that quick purchases of Associated Oil are advisable. Alaska Packers should recover from now on and go higher, and in fact any of the leading California stocks can be bought for reasonable profits by the first of the year.

Charity and Cocktails

The Examiner is to be felicitated on the general cleverness of the women who were enlisted for the Thanksgiving edition in aid of the Associated Charities. But where so many are at work there are bound to be a few that develop too much enthusiam. I have heard of two women who started out bright and early with an automobile full of papers. They are attractive women and their red silk badges were very becoming, so they achieved great success in the sacred cause of charity along Powell street. But as the morning wore along, the festive spirit of Thanksgiving began to crowd their charitable impulses and they sought the inspiration of a cocktail or so in one of the big cafes. Now the cocktail is a seductive beverage and calls always for its mate, so these fair newsies sat somewhat protractedly over their glasses. Then a couple of men whom they knew happened along and there were more cocktails, also, whisper it softly, a dice box and the rattling of the bones, the stakes being more cocktails and copies of the charity edition of the Examiner. In time the party became so jolly that the cafe became too puritanical and the men and women separated, agreeing to meet later at a certain big hostelry.

They Approached the Wrong Women

Our two charitable ladies climbed into their machine and speeded forth in quest of more excitement. They obtained some of it by driving their car along the sidewalk and more at a fashionable hostelry where they did not experience warm hospitality. Meanwhile their masculine friends hied them to another big hotel where they were to meet the festive dames, but being somewhat the worse for cocktails, all charitable workers looked alike to them and they accosted the first ladies they met wearing the red badges of the Associated Charities. A rather incoherent invitation to shake for the drinks startled these ladies into speechless indignation but further misunderstanding was prevented by the arrival of the two ladies for whom they were looking. Their condition was such that they attracted the attention of all the guests in the lounging room. The indignant ladies who had been approached went to their chief of staff, a very charming and well known woman, and threatened to stop selling papers unless the obstreperous ones were deprived of their badges and papers and compelled to depart. But the enthusiastic women refused to give up their badges and held on to their papers and it was only when an official of the Associated Charities had been summoned that they were induced to capitulate. Then gently but firmly they were escorted from the hotel to their automobile and the cause of charity knew them no more that day.

Dr. McEnery Comes, Perhaps to Wed

With the return of Dr. W. A. McEnery who will reach San Francisco about December 22 the rumor of the well known physician's approaching marriage to the wealthy widow Mrs. Chauncey R. Winslow is revived. It is mere gossip, of course, but I am assured that it will be duly authenticated. Mrs. Winslow was formerly Sallie Stetson, daughter of the late J. B. Stetson. She is a divorcee and her former husband married a young society girl of Portland but died suddenly a few months ago. Dr. McEnery is a widower; his late wife was the wealthy widow, Mrs. McLaughlin of Salt Lake who died suddenly a couple of years ago. She was many years the doctor's senior. Miss Isabel McLaughlin has been attending Miss Spence's fashionable boarding school in New York but will join Dr. McEnery and his sister, Miss Therese McEnery, and spend the holidays in this city. Miss McLaughlin is very wealthy in her own right. Her mother left a goodly slice of her fortune to her young husband. There was considerable unpleasantness with the relatives of Miss McLaughlin after her mother's death, but it seems to have been settled amicably.

Gussie Foute's Fairy Godmother

Little Miss Gussie Foute is so happy these days that she confides to everyone the secret of her smiles. It is not an engagement. It's just a bunch of pretty dancing gowns which Mrs. William H. Crocker who is her godmother, gave her. Mrs. Crocker has always made a pet of Gussie, looking out for her in many thoughtful generous ways, ever since the death of her father. One of the gowns is a handsome navy blue chiffon brocaded with black velvet flowers in a big, all-over design. Another is a gray net, trimmed with coral velvet and steel beads. They are all very handsome frocks and very becoming.

The Bowles' Disappoint Oakland

There were several debuts within the past few days. One of them, that of Miss Amy Bowles, has caused a great deal of chagrin in Oakland because Mr. and Mrs. Philip E. Bowles dared to shake the social dust of that side of the bay from their feet in order to give their big coming-out tea at the Fairmont. The Bowles family grew up in Oakland and made their fortune and their history there, so Oakland expected that when the daughter of the family made her social bow it would be to the folks among whom she grew to womanhood. But Oakland has been disappointed in its expectations before this. The Bowles tea was really the most pretentious thing, for an afternoon affair, that has been given to date. It wasn't really a tea, for a hearty buffet luncheon was served, although the hours were from 4 to 7. Oddly enough the guests were arrayed in a variety of styles, tailor-made gowns, long, short and indifferent, training lace gowns suitable for balls, handsome velvets and satins, and even the men manifested the same democratic informality of attire, some coming in sack suits, others in the formal frock suit and so on. But little things like that made no difference. Everyone seemed to be having a good time, particularly Papa Bowles who stood about with an inverness on, the gladdest of them all.

An Arctic Costume

Among the girls from across the bay who attracted more than ordinary attention at the Bowles tea was tall lissome Florence Henshaw who seems to have adopted the Cook-Peary styles with a vengeance, for she looked like some belle from the disputed area. She came robed in fur from head to foot, wearing a coat of white fur, with a hat of the same and a muff of the dimensions of a pillow which she dangled by its strings. As she entered the Fairmont she created a mild furore, the visiting Japanese gentlemen gasping in astonishment, doubtless wondering what it all meant. Miss Henshaw is tall enough to do that sort of thing easily. The afternoon was golden and sunny, and the snowy furs had an odd frigid look hardly matching the skies. But fashion never expects one to match weather conditions and a charming girl like Miss Henshaw may bid defiance to the seasons.

Beautiful Olive Grace Weds a Lord's Son

The many friends in this city of the well-known Grace family will be interested to learn of the marriage of Olive Grace Kerr, niece of the late William R. Grace, to Captain Charles Beresford Fulke Greville, son and heir of Lord Greville. Mrs. Kerr who inherited a large fortune from the New York banker who was her first husband, is a very beautiful woman and enjoys great social popularity in London as well as in New York and Newport. Her marriage to the scion of one of the greatest families in Great Britain took place in St. Paul's Church, Knightsbridge, which ranks St. George's as a favorite church for fashionable London weddings. The wedding was a brilliant one, many of the court circle being present, and was followed by a reception given by Mrs. John W. Grace, the bride's mother. This beautiful Grace girl is now a member of one of the oldest and at the same time most pugnacious families in the United Kingdom. Not long ago a difference in politics between Lord Greville and his son precipitated a clash which is still laughed about as the "battle of Mullingar." It involved the flying of the Irish flag from Mullingar courthouse and after a hand-to-hand fight between the sheriff's men and the lord one one side and the police and the lord's son on the other, the flag was given to the breeze but afterwards captured. The present Lord Greville has had frequent rows with his brothers, Pat and Reggie, the latter being known as "the Limb." So Mrs. Kerr is marrying into a very lively family and should not be bothered with ennui.

The Japanese Reception

I was very much amused and just a little bit chagrined last Saturday night at the behavior of most of the ladies and gentlemen who attended the reception tendered by the Japan Society of America to the Japanese Commercial Commission at the Art Institute on Nob Hill. It was quite a large gathering of fashion, near-fashion, culture and culturine. Of course the lode-stone of the evening should have been the exhibition of paintings by Kubota Beisen, one of the modern masters of Japan. The walls of three rooms were covered by these splendid works and it might be thought that anybody with rudimentary art sense would be irresistibly captivated by their exquisite poetry of line and color. But that was not the case. Here and there I noticed an individual art-lover drinking in the beauties of the paintings, but the great mass of guests stood in the center of the main hall and gossiped, the women lorgnetting the gowns and the men ogling the women and all staring impolitely at the visiting Japanese ladies for all the world as though they had never seen a Japanese lady in native costume before. Henry P. Bowie to whom the collection of paintings belongs interpreted some of the most striking for a few friends who seemed to enjoy the opportunity of bettering their acquaintance with oriental art, but the majority of those present seemed actually afraid to look at the pictures or to comment on them for fear of making a blunder. I wonder what Bowie thought of this peculiar attitude toward art; and I wonder how favorably the son of the great master whose works were exhibited was impressed with these manifestations of western culture. It is too bad that these wonderful works are not more fully appreciated, for they are not to be here long. Mr. Bowie informed me that he intended taking them to Tokio where a publisher is eager to reproduce them in book form.

Captain Wetherill's Good Luck and Good Looks

Captain Alexander Macomb Wetherill whose engagement to Miss Sidonia Furth of Seattle was announced during the week is well known to San Francisco. He was one of society's popular bachelors when he was stationed at the Presidio several years ago. At that time he was the devoted admirer of a charming San Francisco girl whose two sisters are prominent matrons in the "Service" set. Captain Wetherill is considered the handsomest officer in his regiment, which is not to be wondered at when it is known that he is the nephew of that famous promoter of pulchritude, Harriet Hubbard Ayer. No one suspects Captain Wetherill of following his aunt's recipes, but Mrs. Ayer who is a sister of the young officer's mother, is the possessor of rare beauty as well as an authority on how to attain and preserve it. Miss Furth is said to be one of the wealthiest heiresses of the Northwest. Her father is Jacob Furth, a millionaire banker of Tacoma. The young couple met last summer when Captain Wetherill was on duty at the Seattle Exposition.

Re-enter the Cinderellas

Now that the contest for social supremacy has become a triangular affair, we may expect some spirited campaigning. When the issue lay between Mr. Greenway and Mrs. Alexander it was too much to expect that reprisals would be of the vindictive sort, but with three rival armies in the field, all warring at once, it is likely to be a case of "all's fair" and "sauve qui peut." Most of the patronesses of the Cinderellas are of the old exclusive set of this city and it is a real pleasure to see them preparing for renewed social activity. Mrs. Edward L. Eyre was formerly Miss Florence Atherton, sister-in-law of Gertrude Atherton. Mrs. George Pinckard was Miss Belle Eyre. Mrs. Will Tevis was Miss Mabel Pacheco. Mrs. Joseph A. Donohue was Christine Parrott. Mrs. Percy Moore was a Miss Barrada; so was Mrs. Willis Polk. Mrs. John Kittle was one of the Allen family. Mrs. William Breeze was Miss Evelyn Norwood. Mrs. Harry Babcock was a widow, Mrs. Farnham, formerly Miss Roosevelt. Mrs. George Howard was Miss Nettie Schmiedell; her husband belongs to a very old and exclusive family. Mrs. William Tubbs was Miss Filkins. Only Mrs. Carolan who is a daughter of the Pullman millions represents a later era. Here is an array of established aristocracy which will make Mr. Greenway and Mrs. Alexander look to their festive laurels if once it decides to regain its ascendancy. And I am inclined to think that that decision has been arrived at quite seriously.

Mrs. Moore Robinson's Illness

The continued serious illness of Mrs. Edward Moore Robinson of Philadelphia is causing her friends much concern. Mrs. Robinson who is accounted one of the most beautiful women in America, is the sister of Mrs. William G. Irwin of this city. She was Aileen Ivers before her marriage, one of the belles of local society in the debutante days of Jennie Blair, Tessie Fair, now Mrs. Oelrichs, and Hattie Crocker, the present Mrs. Charles Alexander of New York. The Ivers family lived in an old-fashioned house in Leavenworth street near Clay and were in moderate circumstances, but both daughters were beauties and their friends predicted brilliant matches for them. Fannie Ivers married William G. Irwin, the Honolulu sugar king, and a few years later the younger sister Aileen was wooed by one of Philadelphia's most prominent millionaires, so the prophecy was amply fulfilled. Mrs. Robinson's health began to fail last spring and during the summer she went abroad to consult German specialists. It was believed a cure had been effected but recently alarming symptoms returned and the invalid's condition is said to be most serious. Mrs. Robinson's beauty is of the blonde Grecian order. She has brilliant coloring and regular features. Mrs. Irwin and Miss Helene Irwin are at present at the Robinson home "Ashcroft" near Philadelphia where they will remain indefinitely. William G. Irwin returned a few days ago from a month's visit to Philadelphia.

Bryn Mawr Girl is Hostess for Japan

Friends in the national capital write to me that the greatest enthusiasm is evinced in diplomatic circles over the personality of Madame Kosai Uchida, the brilliant young wife of the new Japanese Ambassador. This news is particularly interesting to San Franciscans for Madame Uchida has a brother residing here. Already it is being predicted that the new embassy hostess will be one of the most sought after and most successful entertainers in Washington. She is credited with a large private fortune and is expected to outdo all the former triumphs of the Japanese embassy in splendid hospitality. The fact that Madame Uchida made an unusually fine impression on the exclusive society of ultra-aristocratic Vienna where her husband was lately ambassador is of importance to Washington society, but not so important as the fact that this young Japanese woman is a graduate of Bryn Mawr where she took her baccalaureate in 1897. As Miss Masa Dogura, the present Mme. Uchida was one of the most brilliant, and quite the most picturesque member of her class. She is the daughter of a millionaire shipbuilder of Yamato, one of those progressive, intrepid men who laid the foundations of the "New Japan." His occupation and the vast extent of his interests brought him into constant contact with European men and methods, and he determined to give his children the benefits of an education which would enable them to hold their own in the best society of Europe.

Some of Her Accomplishments

When Miss Masa Dogura matriculated at Bryn Mawr she spoke English fluently, with just the trace of a pretty foreign accent, and was likewise a proficient French and German scholar. Her intellectual attainments put many of her classmates in the background, but, notwithstanding this, she was extremely popular with all of them. Her specialties were history and political science, and in these branches she held a place well up at the head of the class. She was a close student of American political conditions, and worked unceasingly to add to the store of knowledge which has since been so useful to her and also to her distinguished husband. She had a wonderful charm of manner, for which the women of her native land are famed, but was also possessed of more "spirit" than is usually credited to the daughters of Japan. She was fond of society and took part in all the gaieties of college life. Miss Dogura was married to the Japanese statesman and diplomat in 1899. Her friends were given to understand that it was a love match, and that in wedding she had been given far more choice than is usual in Eastern countries. Mme. Uchida is not only handsome, according to Japanese standards, but could hold her own in point of good looks in any American assemblage. She dresses with consummate good taste in the products of the best Parisian and Viennese modistes. She is witty and a good conversationalist.

An Apology to Clyde Fitch, Dead

By Edward F. O'Day

For years it was the fashion to underestimate Clyde Fitch. Dramatic critics are as much the bond-servants of fashion as any other tribe and they deemed it part of their carping routine, year in and year out, to bounce their clubs upon the head of the dead playwright every time he emerged from his study with a new play. "Fitch has committed another one; have at it!" might have been the slogan of the dramatic commentators, so uniformly did they wield their pens in hostility to his prolific output. The present writer admits, in deep humiliation, that he raised his little voice in this raucous hue and cry against a great American playwright. All that he can say to condone that past offending is that his judgment was warped by the falsity of the contemporary standard and that he made his appraisement, honestly but yet mistakenly, at the current schedule of values. That the standard was wrong, that the schedule was grossly inaccurate he now realizes and though the realization comes rather late, it is not too late for posthumous tribute to the memory of the man who was slighted. For Clyde Fitch was a great playwright, a genius in his chosen field, and there is no writer of plays in America who is at present equipped to take his place. That is the secret of Clyde Fitch's achievement; we can see it now when his achievement is completed. He was unique; nobody else succeeded in doing for the American stage that which he accomplished so well; perhaps nobody ever will. Only too well do I recall the formulas wherewith we were wont to overwhelm each new Fitch production. "Innocuous," "vapid" and "pretty" were the damnatory adjectives of faint praise that we threw at him. We could see nothing in "The Girl with the Green Eyes" except jealousy and a Cook's tour; "Barbara Frietchie" was a dramatization of insanity and the American flag; "Captain Jinks" was a little love and a lot of crinoline. We discoursed of his irritating trickery, of his uninspired painstaking, of his hackneyed ideas and his mobilization of stage properties, unimpressed by the nobler aspects of the qualities which we thus stripped naked to accommodate them to our own poverty of insight. The plain truth of the matter is that we were afraid to acclaim Clyde Fitch for the master he was; afraid lest one of our fraternity, or two or three, should ridicule our seriousness of appreciation. But now that he has gone, who can take his place? That is the question, constantly recurring and pointing unerringly to the strength of his dramaturgic position. There is nobody to take his place and those who wish to understand the American drama of his day, must study his plays or go hopelessly unenlightened. The rapidity of production which was part of his genius misled us into proclaiming him an ephemeral composer; we thought that we could puff his pieces down the wind like so much thistledown, pretty but so frail, bright but unenduring. Well, the next generation or so will bear witness whether Clyde Fitch's work has disintegrated and disappeared beneath our foolish little breathings of banter and scorn. It was while I sat in the Valencia Theatre enjoying "The Bachelor," not the last, but perhaps next to the last of Clyde Fitch's productions, that this conviction of error came upon me. It came over me so irresistibly that it would have been disingenuous and dishonest not to say something about it here. So I have made my apology to Clyde Fitch. Much he cares about my apology now; much he would care even if I were one of those who can make and unmake reputations. But with this sincere repentance for a sin of judgment there goes an earnest desire to do better in the future; to deal more justly with the merits of earnest workers for the theatre, and having been one of the most earnest workers for the theatre that America has known, perhaps Clyde Fitch even now cares something for that aspect of this public recantation. If I may be permitted at this point to arise from my lowly position on the mourners' bench, I will get up and testify that "The Bachelor" is a delightful bit of comedy. Clyde Fitch was not one of those who improved by polishing; he learned by doing and kept on learning as he kept on doing. "The Bachelor" is one of the latest and therefore one of the ripest of his plays. Technically it is without fault; so compactly and economically built that it would be hard to find a line too much and equally hard to add a line to any of its scenes. The action is restricted to twenty-four hours, to two scenes and to seven characters and yet within these more than classical unities the story flows uncramped; every character has plenty of elbow room and moves with the freedom of life. It has been customary to admit that Clyde Fitch had remarkably feminine perceptions, that he grasped the psychology of woman as no other American playwright did. This is undoubtedly true and it finds its illustration in "The Bachelor," for despite the title, (or it may be, on account of it), it is a girl who dominates the play. The girl's character is unerringly drawn; there is never a false note in it—those who think that the depiction of a young lady consciously yet in all purity pursuing a reluctant man, is untrue to life, will never understand the perfect naturalness of the greatest stage women from Juliet and Ophelia down to the creations of Bernard Shaw. Fitch has placed before us a young woman who may be found almost anywhere in America, but he has done it with such skillful manipulations of wit and humor that we are apt to overlook the vitality of the presentation. I heard one playgoer say that the scheme of the play was artificial and I think he missed the living significance of the whole affair. But Fitch has done more in "The Bachelor" than draw a natural young woman; he has likewise portrayed a young man who is uncannily real. I do not refer to the bachelor; he is real enough, but in a conventional way. The young man I have in mind is the girl's brother, a boy who has been spoiled by indulgent and wealthy parents so that he has conceived an opinion of his own importance which, if entertained by an older person, would result in insufferable selfishness and unbearable caddishness but which, in a boy with good breeding, such as this boy had, is no more fatal, if properly treated, than the measles or the mumps or any other outbreak of a peculiarly youthful description. I have never seen just this particular boy on the stage before, but I know many like him and I think that Clyde Fitch has painted him to the last stroke of life. It would be ungenerous not to mention here the names of the principal performers in this fine Fitch comedy. Ruth Maycliffe must have the place of honor; she captures her audience from the start with her wonderful smile, her dainty blond beauty and her pervasive maidenliness, but she would not be mentioned before Charles Cherry who is "featured" in the production if it were not for her capable rendition of her role. Cherry is a finished actor and a very pleasing bachelor; small wonder the girl resolved to have him for her own. Ralph Morgan is very good as that remarkable boy.

William H. Thompson at the Orpheum

It is worth while going to the Orpheum this week just to see William H. Thompson in the English playlet, "Pride of Regiment." This is one of those vaudeville numbers that stand out in the bill and indelibly impress themselves upon memory. The scene is the dining room of a humble English cottage. On the walls are pictures of Queen Victoria, King Edward, Earl Roberts and Baden-Powell. Thompson enters, a fine figure of a man, broad-shouldered and stalwart with a breast covered with medals. His wife is preparing supper and in a minute's interchange of talk we learn that the son has left the army and is coming home. Neither mother nor father understands why he has left and while the mother is glad, knowing that her son was never cut out for a soldier, the father is enraged and humiliated, for he served the queen for thirty years and retired a sergeant with a pension and medals. All his ancestors had been soldiers and he could not understand why a son of his should leave the army after a few months. The son enters, finding his father alone and still angry. He lies about the cause of his leaving the army, but finally produces a paper showing that he had been dishonorably discharged after punishment for drunkenness and insubordination. The father drives him out of the house and invokes God's curse on him when he has gone. The scene between father and son is a powerful one and when the son upbraids his father before leaving we learn what a drill-master he has been in his home, his only thought the army and his own fine record. Then follows swiftly a scene between husband and wife. It is quivering with life, a presentation of the reckoning which always comes when a husband has ruled his household with an iron hand, exchanging overbearing-severity for his wife's love. But the wife sees that the recital of her life-long unhappiness with an arrogant help-mate will not do; so she appeals to his love for his son. She coaxes and wheedles; she is sorry that she threatened to leave her old husband; and finally she wins. With a great effort the father swallows his pride and goes out to bring his boy back. But as he embraces him he is careful to pull his coat over the medals on his breast, lest the boy's touch contaminate them. Thompson plays this simple little sketch with great power. He has an expressive face and when he simulates rage it is quite forbidding, especially the thrustout lower lip. The conflict between pride of regiment and paternal love is admirably shown in look and movement and gesture as well as in words. The playlet sheds a light on the strong traditional ties which bind so many families in England to the army; so it gives Americans a peep into the English heart. But without an actor of Thompson's ability, it would be flat and unconvincing. Two other acts stand out this week in the Orpheum bill. Mabel McCane whose name is well known to lovers of vaudeville, sings some of her clever songs. Miss McCane is a very fetching young woman who has no difficulty in keeping the attention of her audience. Her good looks would do that even if she could not sing and she is a very charming vocalist. Miss McCane is one of the brainy young women of the circuits. The other attraction is, of course, Ben Welch, an old favorite about whom it is only necessary to say that he is as good as ever.

—Edward F. O'Day.

The Talk of San Francisco

It is not too much to say that at the present writing George Cohan is the most popular man in San Francisco. After an absence of many years he has returned with a cracking good company in one of the best shows he ever wrote. It was not by design that he followed Victor Moore in one of his own plays, but the comparison suggested makes Victor Moore look like a second-rater and the Victor Moore show even worse. For "The Yankee Prince" was built by Cohan for Cohan and he worked with loving care also for his mother and father. The lines are always funny and very often brilliant, the music is of the kind that everybody wants to whistle and the show girls are snappy and pretty. Of course George Cohan can't sing and doesn't pretend to try, but his vocal efforts are perfectly satisfactory. It is almost enough just to see Cohan walk across the stage with that walk which is the envy of all the rising young vaudevillains in the country. The reception which has been accorded Cohan in this city is really remarkable. One might imagine that he was born here or that San Francisco had suddenly acquired a large population transplanted from Broadway. But the Yankee Doodle boy is a national character and it was to be expected that the playgoers would turn out to greet him with tumultuous welcome. The engagement will continue for another week, coming to an end on Sunday night, December 12. The next attraction at the Van Ness will be captivating Fritzi Scheff who will be seen here in her newest comic opera success, "The Prima Donna," which was written for her by Henry Blossom and Victor Herbert. The piece comes here from the Knickerbocker Theatre. Miss Scheff has not only a strong acting role, but also several songs which enable her to display her vocal powers. The advance sale of seats begins Thursday.

EVA TAYLOR

Who will appear in her laughable hit "Mrs. Jones Smith Carey" next week at the Orpheum.

Comic Opera at the Valencia

Charles Cherry will make his last appearances as "The Bachelor" at the Valencia this Saturday afternoon and evening, and at a special matinee Sunday, Julian Edwards' famous comic opera, "The Gay Musician," will begin a run limited to two weeks. "The Gay Musician" is now in its second season and ran last year for one hundred nights at Wallack's Theatre, New York. It has also been presented in the principal cities of the country and everywhere has met with lavish praise. One of the principal charms of "The Gay Musician" is said to be that it is of a neat and refined order, vulgarity finding no place in its presentation. The cast is a notable one in every respect. Special attention has been paid to the selection of the show girls, chorus and dancers. Among the principals are Texas Guinan, the comic opera prima donna, Harry Bonham, the baritone, Roger Gray, a comedian and dancer, Margaret Crawford, a character actress and singer and many others.

George Hamlin's Concerts

George Hamlin, the tenor, will give his second concert at the Novelty Theatre this Sunday afternoon and will render a varied program. Seats are on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co's, but on Sunday the box office will be open at the theatre. Next Tuesday night Mr. Hamlin will give his farewell concert, offering works by Schubert, Schumann, a group by Brahms and another by Richard Strauss, a song cycle by Roger Quilter and songs by Lohr, Rummel, Daniels, Schneider and Campbell-Tipton. Complete programs may be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co's. On Wednesday afternoon Mr. Hamlin will sing in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse, repeating the program of his opening night here.

Lorimer in a Biblical Play

"The Shepherd King," the current attraction at the Garrick, with Wright Lorimer at the head of the company, is making a big hit. Not even "Ben-Hur" created a deeper impression than has this work of Lorimer. He has founded his play on a biblical topic depicting a life that is sacred, but has treated the subject with virile human interest, introducing an interesting romance of love and spirited action. Lorimer is as good an actor as he is an author. His interpretation of his hero role is his own and he carries out his ideal of the "Shepherd King." His support is competent and the production is fine in its fidelity to history, its massiveness and splendor. "The Shepherd King" stays at the Garrick all this and next week.

Fritz Kreisler's Concerts

No artist who has visited this city has left more friends and admirers than Fritz Kreisler who is sometimes called "the master-singer of the violin." There will be three Kreisler concerts at the Novelty Theatre, the dates being Sunday afternoon, December 12, Thursday evening, December 16 and Sunday afternoon, December 19. Every program is replete with great works and Kreisler will play some of those delightful old Italian and French things which no else renders as he does. Complete programs may be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co's where the sale of seats opens next Wednesday morning. On Tuesday night, December 14, Kreisler will furnish the program for the second of the St. Francis Musical Art Concerts, and on Friday afternoon, December 17, he will play in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse.

"A Message from Mars" at the Alcazar

"A Message from Mars" is to be the Alcazar's next offering, commencing Monday night. It was written by Richard Ganthony, and after running two years in London, had a year's brilliant success in New York. To give an adequate production of this play the Alcazar's artistic and mechanical resources are severely taxed, as the staging calls not only for elaborate pictorial effect, but demands numerous trick devices which are essential to a coherent development of the plot. All the Alcazar favorites and a number of extra people will be in the cast. John Ince will have the most subtle role he has ever played at the theatre, and Louis Bennison will be afforded opportunity to do some great acting. Charles Dow Clark will portray a tramp, a character that some critics have pronounced the best-drawn in the play.

FRITZ KREISLER
The Master-Singer of the Violin.

Evelyn Vaughan will be seen as the hero's fiancee, Howard Hickman as one of her suitors, Bessie Barriscale as a petite maid, and Grace Travers and Adele Belgarde will also be seen to good advantage.

Thompson to Have an Irving Part Next Week

Miss Eva Taylor who last distinguished herself here in the Frohman farce "Chums" will appear in an amusing comedietta at the Orpheum next week. Florence Bindley will introduce her musical monologue, "An Afternoon at Home," in which she appears as a society leader. Miss Stella Morrisini, a statuesque English beauty and one of the best animal trainers in Europe, will introduce her wonderful leaping Siberian wolf hounds and Shetland ponies. The Four Floods are acrobatic merry makers. One of the most interesting features of next week's program will be the first presentation in this city of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's one act drama, "Waterloo" by William H. Thompson, who will be seen in Irving's role of Corporal William Brewster. Next week will be Mr. Thompson's last. It will also conclude the engagements of the Two Bobs, Quinlan and Mack and Mabel McCane.

Psychology of the Chorus Man

It has remained for Max Beerbohm, the brilliant dramatic critic of the Saturday Review of London and accounted one of the three cleverest young men in London (the other two being Chesterton and Hilaire Belloc), to delve into the psychology of the despised chorus man. Writing of the Gaiety spectacles which have been revived recently, he tackles the chorus man's raison d'etre in part as follows: There seems nothing at all absurd in the idea of pretty young women, dressed in the very latest fashion, singing and dancing in unison certain songs and dances in which they have been trained with a view to showing themselves off to the best advantage. What more natural, asks man, than that woman should wish to please? What more natural than that she should exercise fascination in public, at large, six or seven times a week? He would not care to do it himself. He would deem it beneath his dignity. He reserves his charms for private life. He doesn't mind showing off in a room; but in any public place he hates to draw attention—favorable or unfavorable—to himself. Observe any average man and woman entering a restaurant together. The difference in their costumes is a perfect symbol of the difference in their comportment. Whereas the woman has a garb of bright colors, and, belike, of some fantastic shape decreed by the mode of the moment, the man wears the nearest equivalent for a cloak of invisibility. I conceive that the average woman sees nothing ludicrous in the chorus at the Gaiety: the choristers are but doing for a salary, and in a trained manner, what she does casually for nothing. But "the chorus" is an arbitrary term. There are two choruses at the Gaiety. And I am certain that to the average man the male choristers seem to occupy a very absurd and lamentable position. This difference of effect is the more interesting because, strictly, the one chorus is an exact pendant to the other. The men, like the women, have been selected for their good looks, and have been dressed in the latest fashion, and sing the same sort of songs in the same sort of way. They have been drilled to wave their walking-sticks at one moment, and at another to draw their handkerchiefs out of their cuffs and flick imaginary dust off their uniform boots, and perform simultaneously other bits of "business" equivalent to what the women have been drilled to perform. The only differences are that the men do not appear so frequently, and that they do not display that languor which seemed to me the one ridiculous thing about the performance of the women. They work with a will. I suppose it is the courage of despair that upholds them. They feel that since there is no escape they may as well put a brave face on the matter. But, heroes though they are, they excite only amusement and contempt among the audience.

Then Sonia rose to her full height. She had been temporarily stupefied by this scene, but now, gathering together all the indignation and contempt that a woman can feel for a man, she uttered these words:

"Foul beast!"

This expression is the most terrible one of which the language is capable. The man trembled and clenched his fist.

"Bah!" she said, "you can't frighten me! I'll say it to you again!"

The man looked about him. He saw on every side expressions of hatred and disgust and lost what little courage he had. He stammered: "If you want to look at it that way, of course, there is nothing for me to do but to retire. Waiter, bring the bill."

Then Sonia, in a voice that could be heard throughout the room exclaimed: "Waiter, bring me the bill! I am paying for this. I would not accept a dinner from a man of this kind!"

She flung a bank-note on the table without waiting for her change and with that splendid dignity that many women of her class possess, walked out of the room.

The man rose deathly pale and trembling in every limb. He staggered, leaning upon the tables, trying to make his way out; but those who were present and had witnessed the scene would not have it so. The men in their evening clothes, some of whom wore the insignia of the Legion of Honor, the decolettee women with their strings of pearls and their necklaces of diamonds, were all human and all had hearts. It was impossible for him to reach the door. One man struck him in the face, a handsome woman rose from her table and slapped him. He fell and those nearby leaped at him like a pack of hounds upon a deer.

Suddenly they were confronted by a frail little woman. It was the wife, who had recovered from her swoon, and her voice rose high above the tumult:

"Ladies! Gentlemen! I beg you to do him no harm! In spite of all he is my husband, the father of my child, and—I love him!"

comfort—courts and gardens, pools, fish-tanks, storerooms and baths.

The Street of the Capitol is perhaps the most impressive. It runs from north to south between the little temple of "The Genius of the Colony," whose pronaos was supported by Corinthian columns that have been re-erected, and Trajan's arch, which in point of size dominates all the other monuments of the city. There the street broadens out and takes the proportions of a square in front of the propylaea of the Capitol.

The Capitol! What remains of it? The twelve columns of the peristyle, the foundations of the altar and a porch of forty steps, surmounted by two superb columns nearly forty feet high. The attic and the slabs that supported it lie in the dust; the galleries are broken through, the sacred enclosure choked with stones, and the colossal statues of Juno and Minerva have vanished. But how huge these ruins are and how magnificently they proclaim the power of Rome and her gratitude to the colony's tutelary divinities!

Let us halt before the public market beside the street we have been following. The tables on which the market people exposed their wares are still in place. In the centre of a court paved with blue stones and surrounded with a portico was a fountain. Awnings to shelter the vendors were upheld by slender columns. Further on we come to the house of the gardeners, so prettily decorated with flower-baskets!

Springs in the gorges of the Ain-Mooris supplied the city, furnishing all the water needed for the baths, fountains, markets, public edifices and dwellings. After washing the streets, the water passed through aqueducts and sewers to replenish the gardens of the outlying districts. It was one of the finest things about this city of the desert that its streets were always white and clean, its squares cooled by plashing fountains, its surrounding country gay with greenery.

These abundant waters were the very life of Timgad. When the first Berber invaders swooped down, the city of Trajan was sacked, but as the aqueducts were not destroyed, water still flowed in from the Ain-Mooris. In the immense desert that reaches down from the mountains of the Aures toward Batna, Thamugadi remained a sort of oasis. It emerged from its ruins. A Christian city, smaller but beautiful and fluorishing, took the place of the Roman town. Then arose the basilicas, the baptisteries, and the convents whose imposing remains have been discovered. A fort, built by Solomon, successor to Belisarius, protected the city against fresh incursions. It lived in peace—for how long a time?

Of its final destruction nothing definite is known. M. Albert Ballu tells us that in the eighth century the Berbers camped on its ruins. This time, Timgad was not to rise again. The wrecked aqueducts no longer furnished water. Houses and public buildings were overthrown. The desert crept over the place where Timgad had stood. Dust-storms buried the debris. Sand-storms completed its interment. It seemed to sink into the earth. In that awful solitude no witness was at hand to make record of its fate. Only the entablature of a great triumphal arch was left above the surface to indicate that the place had once been inhabited.

Auto Notes

Among the recent sales reported by the Standard Motor Car Company is one to Mr. E. H. Wedgewood of Oroville who placed his order for one of the new Ford Town cars, the style of which promises to become so popular on the coast. This is one of the first of this type of machine from the factory to arrive in this city. The fact that several of these cars have already been sold shows the tendency of the motor buying public to the inclosed cars.

The Diamond Rubber Company is in receipt of advices from their Los Angeles branch that the Apperson Jack-Rabbit which won the heavy stock car Portola Cup, won the 150 mile track race at Ascot Park. The total tire trouble for the entire distance was one puncture and a change through the means of Diamond Demountable Rims was effected in 1½ minutes.

"That the effect gained by having the entire body of an automobile between the axles is far more advantageous than the style which has prevailed heretofore, is evidenced these rainy days," says Roy D. Pike of the Pioneer Automobile Company. "The Chalmers-Detroit Motor Company are the first builders in America, and the only ones so far, to adopt this new idea of automobile construction, and the Chalmers "30" with its long wheel base of 115 inches and dropped frame, giving a low hung car all between the axles, will hardly skid at all as compared with the old idea of construction, with the much overhung frame. Think what a saving to the tires not to use skid chains for safety. This idea, to my mind, is one of the greatest strides made recently in automobile building and I hope that with the small non-skid protection which the tire people are now using, skid chains will soon be a thing of the past."

Mr. W. L. Hughson, president of the Standard Motor Car Company, reported recently the closing of an agency with Christman Brothers of Coalinga, which concern has made a contract for a large number of Ford cars. The first shipment to the new agents consisted of four machines, the cars being driven from this city to Coalinga by the new representatives of the Ford machines in that territory. According to Christman Brothers the demand for the light class of cars, such as the Ford, is going to be such that they expect to sell as many cars as they can secure from the Standard Motor Car Company of this city.

To the list of baseball celebrities who own and drive their own Studebaker cars has been added president Charles A. Comiskey of the White Sox. Comiskey purchased his car a few days ago from the Chicago branch of the Studebakers previous to taking his annual hunt on the Mississippi river. The car was one of the new Studebaker "40's" of the "6-7" model, equipped with a limousine body. A few weeks ago "Hughie" Jennings, the popular manager of the Detroit American baseball league, purchased one of the new Studebaker E-M-F "30" cars at Detroit. Immediately thereafter he drove his machine to Scranton, Pa., his winter home, where he is practicing law.

"That the auto stage is the most popular means of conveyance in the mountain districts is evidenced by the number of inquiries about Thomas cars for stage use," says M. S. Harris of the Pioneer Automobile Company. "There is no doubt that nearly all of the stage lines of any importance through the State will be covered by automobiles in the coming year."

G. H. Meyers of the Norman B. Livermore Company paid a pretty compliment to the construction of the Hudson Runabout when he said that it was the most refined piece of mechanical detail in the form of an automobile that he had seen. Mr. Meyers being a mechanical engineer, knows what he is talking about.

The Pioneer Automobile Company have just delivered to Martin Regensburger, for use of the California State Board of Health, a Chalmers-Detroit forty touring car. This car is to be used over the entire State in their campaign against the squirrel plague in which both the State and Federal authorities are spending a great deal of money The car will be under the direct supervision of Dr. Rocker and will be put to the severest strain. They made their purchase only after very grilling demonstration, going into the hill country where there are few roads and many streams to be forded, as it seems that the plague-infected squirrel has a habit of keeping house in that part of the country where there are very few roads.

C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast Manager of The Diamond Rubber Company, has just returned from the factory at Akron, Ohio, and is particularly enthusiastic as to the outlook of Diamond Tires for 1910. "In spite of our enormous plant, we were absolutely unable to fill all our 1909 orders," said Mr. Mathewson recently "However, we are doing everything possible to take care of the 1910 business and looking for an immense increase, we have just added three six story buildings to our plant, each covering one-half an acre. One of these is to be used for office purposes, while the other two are almost exclusively for the manufacture of tires."

The Pacific Motor Car Company has delivered a Stevens-Duryea five passenger touring car to Frank L. Dreischmeyer of San Jose. In the last twelve months the Pacific Motor Car Company has delivered eighty-five Stevens-Duryea cars. Out of this number twenty-seven cars were sold to old owners, forty cars sold to people who owner other cars, and eighteen sold to people who never owned a motor car before.

Mr. C. A. Warren, owner of a 6-70 Thomas Flyer, put his car in the race in San Jose last Sunday, and won the 50 mile race in 52 minutes, within one minute of making the world's record. The San Jose track is a new one and was very dusty. The car would probably have broken the world's record if the track had been in better condition. Mr. W. H. Turner, a racing driver from New York, came out purposely to drive the car. He drove the Thomas car in the New York to Paris race Mr. Warren received a very handsome cup and Mr. Turner a $300 cash prize.

Letters

"When a Man Marries"

Mary Roberts Rinehart has turned from detective stories for the moment, to give her attention to pure comedy, and her "When a Man Marries" might almost be staged as it stands as an exposition of the yellow society column's presentation of the doings of our best, i. e., our richest society. "Jimmy" Wilson was an artist, at least, he tried hard to be. He had married a fool of a wife and was still a fool about her though she promptly divorced him, and on the anniversary of the separation, to prevent him from moping over his loss, Kit McNair, daughter of a multimillionaire, and one of the set, proposes a dinner for eight with unlimited bridge afterward at what is now the bachelor residence and studio of the "artist." A choice coterie of flibbertigibets of both sexes was easily gathered, the Dallas Browns bringing with them a stranger who was to prove "great fun" for the rest, being a civil engineer from South America home on a short vacation, a serious, practical worker in direct contrast with the butterflies. The affair might have gone off well enough but for three unexpected contingencies. Celina Caruthers, the maiden aunt of the artist, old-fashioned as morality itself and a perfect housewife, sent word to her nephew that she intended honoring him with a visit of a few hours on that very evening. She was opposed to divorce, ostentatious extravagance, gambling and all the other "harmless" diversions of the plutocracy, and it was essential that a good front should be presented before her because she was the financier of the Wilson household. Every mouthful of food and drink, every article of clothing, every cigarette, was supplied by her bounty, and, of course, it would never do to let her know that there had been a divorce, much less that the anniversary was being kept in such style, so, to tide over the awkwardness, as it was Aunt Selina's first visit and she had never met the ex-wife, Bella, Miss Kit McNair agreed to fill the role for one night only, and though her ignorance of the geography of her own residence would have been what the small boy would term "a dead giveaway" for a bourgeoise, it was easily overlooked in her case. Champagne and roulette devices having been hustled out of sight, the dinner was served, but the immaculate Japanese butler showed such startling symptoms of severe illness that a maid was substituted and a physician called, behind the scenes, of course. The company was not disturbed by such trifling details. Bella, the ex-wife, now appeared on the scene, or rather, behind it. Like many another divorcee, though she was willing and even anxious for the legal operation of a severance, she was by no means so ready to relinquish her hold, and with a trumped up excuse of wishing to see the butler she had gained admittance in order to discover what was going on in the house once hers. The next character introduced was an emissary from the Board of Health, who affixed a small-pox placard to the front door, set guards about the house and announced it in a state of quarantine. Still another discovery awaited the guests, namely that the servants, suspecting the nature of the butler's indisposition, had vanished before an alarm was raised. A policeman, comfortably asleep in the basement, with an empty plate before him was added to the group and now we have: Aunt Selina, who is to be kept in the dark as to the condition of the household, lest she be shocked enough to cut off supplies; Jimmy Wilson, involuntary host for an indefinite period, having under his roof the wife who has divorced him, whom he still loves, and who is outrageously jealous of him, and the masquerader who was to play Mrs. Wilson for a few hours but who is now apparently cast in the role for at least a month; Dallas Brown and his wife who, being married and not divorced, can play propriety; Max Reed, an empty-headed club man whose silly bets over the telephone result in the reinforcement of guards and the constant presence of reporters; "Lollie" and Betty Mercer, two idiotic society girls; Officer Flannigan, and Mr. Harbison, the civil engineer, and out of the whole conglomeration there wasn't one, besides Flannigan and Harbison, with ordinary "gumption" enough to know how to strike a match for any purpose save to light a cigarette. During the four or five days while they were imprisoned before it was ascertained that the Japanese did not have small pox there was opportunity for any amount of bridge, flirtation, quarrels, misunderstandings and catastrophes, amongst them another small pox scare and a mysterious assault, to say nothing of the disappearance of pearl necklaces, diamond bracelets, watches and minor valuables when there were no servants to accuse and the board of health warning a sufficient protection against burglars. Being a comedy, of course everything ended more than well, with Jim and Bella reconciled and ready to be remarried, Aunt Selina beaming on the reunited pair, and the chivalrous Harbison and Miss McNair, after having quarreled and cross purposed each other as often as they could find opportunity, billing and cooing in turtle-dove style. It is well that novelists have only to mate their couples, not to round off the sharp corners after matrimony. The missing jewelry is all recovered and the blight of suspicion removed when it is found that all the while there has been a genuine burglar concealed on the premises and as unable to escape through the cordon of reporters and sanitary police as any of the rest of the inmates, but all the time obliged to secret himself when, where and how he could. This is one of the kind of books that can be read through at a sitting and enjoyed in every page if only the reader will agree to dismiss probability, logic and common sense before beginning it. Mrs. Rinehart has not meant to do more than present a rollicking farce and it would not be fair to judge her by a different standard from that used to measure stage productions of the same caliber. Otherwise, there is no choice but to quote "Tubby" McGuirk, the burglar, as he was being escorted from the premises, minus all his loot, and with five days of desperate hard living in but not of high society—"Jail will be a paradise after this." Bobbs-Merrill have been most generous in the matter of illustrations, both colored and black and white.

Love Uncritical

When first I 'gan to know thee, dear,
Thy faults I did espy,
And "Sure this is a blemish here,
And that's a vice," said I.

But since that hour I did resign
My judgment to my fate,
Thou art no more than only mine,
To love and vindicate.

Henceforth thy champion am I vow'd,
And stultify my sense,
Not owning what I proved, yet proud
To die in its defence.

The kerchief that thou gav'st I'll wear
Upon mine eye-lids bound;
And every man I meet I'll dare
To find the faults I found.

"Is your father a church member, Miss Jorkins?" was asked of the editor' daughter.

"No," she replied. "Pa thought of becoming an Episcopalian, but his principles forbid his acceptance of thirty-nine articles all in a bunch."

"I've heard a good deal about mud-slinging in politics," said the facetious man. "Now, I'd like to know what becomes of the mud?"

"Oh," replied the politician, "that's easy. It goes to make the ground for libel suits."

Finesse

If all my dreams were prophecies,
And all my hopes came true,
If all my songs had golden wings,
To carry love to you;
If all your heart were mine indeed,
In sadness or in mirth,
I would not barter my estate
For any king's on earth.

Alas! my dreams become nightmares,
My hopes are blasted trust,
My songs are in falsetto key,
My wishes are as dust.
Your heart has never answered mine,
Perhaps it never will,—
For though I am your humble slave,
I'd be your monarch still.

A king should rule with potency,
The slave a suppliant is;
So since you flout my monarchy,
My only hope is this:—
To leave you, to deceive you, dear,
To vex your mind with doubt,
And by this sweet diplomacy
To win you out and out

He was an artist at sleight-of-hand,
A song-and-dance lady, she.
They met at one, they loved at two,
They married at half-past three!
A brief, brief dream of wedded bliss,
Then she criticized his tricks;
They wrangled at four, they quarreled at five,
And parted forever at six!

THE STRAIGHT-LINE-DRIVE

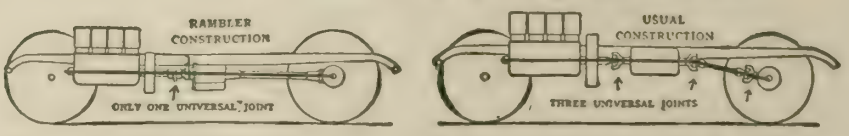
Power cannot be carried around a corner without great loss, due to friction. In the ordinary automobile much energy is wasted in transmitting the power from the engine to the rear axle through universal joints, or, in other words, around corners.

In the Rambler the driving shaft, when the load is in the car, is in direct line with the crank shaft and the angle found at one of the universal joints in most other driving systems is eliminated. The drive is thus accomplished in a direct line.

The Rambler straight-line-drive delivers the maximum power—saves energy—prevents wear—reduces cost of upkeep.

Rambler

The Car with the Offset Crank Shaft



The great economy and efficiency of this car is due to such exclusive Rambler features as the Offset Crank Shaft, Straight-line-drive, Safety Spark Retarder, Rambler Spare Wheel, etc. Let us prove this to you. Call and we will explain these Rambler features in detail, and by actual demonstration; no obligation on your part whatever.

YOSEMITE IN WINTER

He who has not yet made this trip (and it has only been possible during the last two years) has still a new pleasure left to enjoy. A large percentage of Californians have visited Yosemite in summer. Some have gone once or twice, while others have formed the Yosemite habit and every summer sees them hastening away from the cities, from the sea-coast and from the interior valleys to Nature's garden in the heart of the Sierras. It is only since the Yosemite Valley railroad was built up the Merced Canyon, along the banks of the winding Merced River, and the opening of the beautiful and comfortable Hotel del Portal at the entrance of the National Park that it has been possible for any but the seasoned mountain climber to penetrate into the mountain recesses during the winter months. When you suggest it the average person says, "Yes, it must be beautiful in winter, but—" and then he shivers. All of which shows that he is ignorant of conditions in Yosemite. The best way to see Yosemite in winter is to take the train from Merced to El Portal—you can make the trip from San Francisco to El Portal in nine hours, including the short stay at Merced; then spend a few days at the Hotel del Portal, taking it easy, or exploring the country, visiting the Indian Village, the old gold mine, playing tennis, tramping, driving, riding and enjoying the warm winter sunshine. Then when you feel in the mood, take one of the daily stages over the Government road into the heart of Yosemite Valley. The trip occupies about three hours. It does not matter how often you have been into Yosemite in summer; it does not matter how many pictures you have seen; it does not matter how much you have prepared yourself to be surprised, this trip will still be a revelation to you of beauty beyond your dreams. To Californians particularly, the trip to Yosemite in winter offers opportunity for amusements not often enjoyed. Skating on Mirror Lake or on the artificial pond, tobogganning under Glacier Point, skeeing on the higher elevations, driving to the exhilarating music of the sleigh bells, all this is delightful. You do not feel the cold, for the air is crisp and dry, and young or old, you roll a snowball and hasten to "repel the attack" whether you are seven or seventy. And on your return to the Hotel del Portal, with its spacious lounging room, its great, roaring fire of logs and pine cones, you feel that life has added a new experience and that a trip to Yosemite in winter is well worth while.

The Mayor Elect

At the last annual pow-wow and foodfest of the Merchants Association Mayor-elect McCarthy was introduced as the headliner of the occasion, and after deep scrutiny and close analysis he was adjudged a man of promise and assured of the best wishes and co-operation of all present. The members of the Merchants Association have signified their intention of reposing their confidence in the Mayor-elect. This is as it should be. There has been observable in certain circles, since Mr. McCarthy's election, a disposition to regard him with distrust and to defy him to make good. Now for this attitude there is no justification that we can conceive. Early in his public career we were inclined to regard the President of the Building Trades Council as a perfect type of self-seeking labor agitator, but this estimate of him has certainly not been vindicated through the fugacious years in which he has been prominently before the public. He has been painted black by his enemies, but he has retained to an amazing degree the loyalty of his followers, and he has been sponsored from time to time by gentlemen who are believed to be among our most distinguished citizens. Indeed by reason of the confidence of these distinguished citizens in Mr. McCarthy he was enabled to fit himself by experience for the exalted office to which he has been elected. Their interest in him may have sprung from recognition of the advantages that might accrue to them from the cultivation of the friendship of a powerful labor leader, but whatever the motive that be attributed to them the fact remains that they afforded him an excellent training for the duties which he is about to undertake. In every official position he has occupied he has proved himself a man of ability, and despite the enemies he has made in his zeal for the interests the Building Trades Council, and their persistent efforts to besmirch his character, and tempt him into disloyalty, he enjoys among his followers today the reputation of being an honest man. So why should we distrust him? He is at least entitled to as much encouragement as was given Mayor Taylor at the outset of that gentleman's official career.

American Humor

A writer asks in the columns of the New York World, "What is the matter with American humor?" He has observed that the best musical comedy running in New York is of English origin, and that invariably the best musical comedy in New York comes from London. Nor according to this writer, is the decline of American humor observable only in musical comedy or confined to the stage; the English comedy of manners is vastly superior to ours, and our leading comic papers are far inferior in wit and humor to London Punch, a journal which we have been taught to regard as more ridiculous than funny. The average American in the fulness of his conceit will doubtless pooh-pooh these observations, but the average American is not a good judge of humor, and that is precisely what is the matter with American humor. The best evidence of the dullness of the American sense of humor is that the best of the American comic weeklies has by far the smallest circulation. A nice taste for the comic cannot be had without refinement of manners, and that is what we lack. The nonsense that is best appreciated in this country is that which appeals to the loud guffaw. That is why Puck and Judge have a much larger circulation than Life. It is why we still laugh at the comedian who sits down on a tack. It is also why men in public life that strut and prance and plume themselves and take themselves seriously are taken seriously. The protracted prevalence of William J. Bryan is prima facie evidence of the dullness of the American sense of humor and of the crying necessity of the power of luminous mockery and the radiant force of epigram.

The Folly of Centralization

That Senator Elihu Root has not been converted to the Roosevelt philosophy with reference to the centralization of power in the hands of the Federal Government was made evident at the banquet of the National Civic Federation in New York. On that occasion Darwin P. Kingsley, president of the New York Life Insurance Company, urged that as the insurance business was by its nature interstate commerce it should come under the regulation of the Federal Government and not be subject to State courts and State control. Senator Root took occasion to argue against the proposition, and incidentally protested against the tendency toward centralization of power which received great impetus during the administration of Theodore Roosevelt. "If," said Senator Root, "there were no other question but the question of whether the national Government or the State Government should deal with insurance it might not be so important, but you cannot confine the proposal to insurance alone." He pointed out that the purpose of our Constitution is to preserve at once the strength of a great national power and the freedom and personal independence of local self-government. Of course, as Senator Root shrewdly remarked, if we reform the Constitution as to insurance we shall gradually do it as to hundreds of other things, and eventually State lines will be wiped out, and the greatest mischief that will result therefrom will be felt principally at Washington, as the central Government will be unable to discharge the duties that will be imposed upon it. What central Government could reconcile and harmonize the complicated and conflicting interests of all the States of the Union? A task so obviously impossible would be undertaken by no statesman unendued with divine power, and as a Theodore Roosevelt comes but once in two thousand years the folly of bringing about a situation demanding his full capacity is apparent.

The Prophecy of a Sociologist

Robert L. Hunter, a sociological expert, makes the prediction that the onward march of civilization will soon be checked, that stagnation will follow, individual initiative will be abated, State socialism will ensue and character will deteriorate. It is much easier to make predictions than to prove that a prohecy is not to be fulfilled. If it were otherwise prophets and oracles would have no standing in polite circles. Realizing the futility of trying to prove a prophet a charlatan we shall not devote any space to the discussion of Mr. Hunter's predictions. We do not mind affirming, however, that his views of current phenomena are not conclusive of a capacity for comprehensive thought. He says among other things that civilization already shows symptoms of deterioration and that morals are declining. Now the word civilization has more than one meaning and questions of morality are determined from points of view. Civilization may mean human improvement in general, or it may mean certain kinds of improvement in particular. Some philosophers regard that country as civilized in which have been developed the noblest characteristics of man and society; others maintain that civilization is that which distinguishes a wealthy or powerful nation from savages or barbarians. There are also philosophers who are very much in doubt as to whether civilization is on the whole a good or an evil. They hold that if civilization means the greatest good for the greatest number of any community then history teaches us that barbarians have been uncivilized by introduction to civilization. Now as to morality it varies by time, place and circumstance. Among the ancients virtue meant courage. In modern times loyalty to the king has been regarded as the supreme test of morality. Among women, and frequently among men, immorality signifies sexual irregularity. Burning hereties was at one time ethically justified, while acts which involve no injury to anyone except the person committing them, have been and still are denounced as the worst immorality. So far as moral or immoral conduct is to be judged by rules which receive their sanction from religious authority there has been a complete and startling lapse from former conditions. From the religious standpoint, therefore, moral decadence has been going on steadily since the days of the Blue Laws, some of which are still enforced in the East on moral grounds which are not recognized in this part of the country. Now the stability of the social order is regarded by some as the criterion of morality, the theory upon which this idea is based being that the greater the general welfare the more perfect the morality. And there is considerable warrant for this theory, for even wise theologians have held that unhappiness is in proportion to sinfulness. If the converse of the proposition be true the morality of a community may be gauged by the degree of happiness prevalent therein. There is much more to be said on this subject, but we think we have said enough to indicate that Mr. Hunter is a philosopher who is not given to close reasoning.

Spiritualism, Past and Present

A revival of interest in so-called psychic phenomena has taken place in this country and in England, and as invariably happens whenever we take up anything of ancient origin, we deal with it as though it had come to us at first hand, or at least as though no light ever before had been shed upon it. Ghostland always has been a region that fascinated the human mind. There lies the cradle of religion. There was born in the virginal innocence of the primeval world the ideal that is the essence of all poetry. It has been the dream of centuries that some day man would be able to glimpse the mystery of his being in the glimmering haze of that faint twilight through which shadowy forms flit like angels and in which all that is undefined is pregnant with wonder. We are told that much progress has been made of late in psychical research, and that dignity has been added to spiritualism by the acceptance among scholars of proofs of communication with the dead. A spiritualistic medium who is now in this country has convinced many worthy persons that her performances are genuine manifestations of the power of invoking impalpable personages from the confines of the invisible world. Sir Oliver Lodge, a noted scientist, says that he has investigated and found that spirits are persuaded to communicate with mortals, and but a few weeks ago, William Stead, the noted British journalist, reported that he had received a message about the budget from Gladstone. Now, as a matter of fact, we have not advanced at all in our study of the psychical or in our efforts to penetrate the curtain that hangs between us and Ghostland. William Stead, accepting his testimony as true, has experienced nothing more wonderful that the woman who said unto Saul, "I saw gods ascending out of the earth." Nor are mediums doing anything more wonderful than was done by necromancers thousands of years ago. Anybody who has any acquaintance with the literature of modern spiritualism in the broadest acceptation of that term knows that precisely what our mediums are doing today was done a century ago, and that the speculations of our scientists are along the same lines that were pursued by distinguished scholars long before Sir Oliver Lodge was born. All the phenomena that we now hear of, both objective and subjective, from the raps which are heard at every seance to the hearing of articulate words which the auditor is conscious are inaudible to other persons, were investigated in the early part of the last century by William Crooks, a Fellow of the Royal Society, famous for his researches in chemical analysis, photography, metallurgy, physical optics, astronomy and meteorology. He spent much of his time in the investigation of psychical phenomena, and he admitted the occurrence of both psysical and intellectual phenomena which were explicable on no known physical theory. It was his hypothesis that a certain aura or athmosphere emanates from groups of certain persons, in or by virtue of which events occur. This atmosphere he called the psychic force. Beyond the point that certain phenomena are genuine but inexplicable, he did not carry his conclusions. He admitted the existence of a peculiar force, the law and the origin of its activity being unknown. Dr. Mahon, the first president of Oberlin College, Ohio, is another scholar who contributed to the literature of psychical research. He found what he called "valid evidence for the reality of the facts of spiritualism," and he believed that "moral honesty necessitated the admission of the facts." He argued that what he called the odylic force was identical with that which is the immediate cause of spirit manifestations, which again is identical with that from which result all the phenomena of mesmerism and clairvoyance. Dr. Mahon recognized a group of phenomena in which

A Dictator for Revenue Only

President Zelaya, the Central American Captain of Industry, Has Never Overlooked an Opportunity to Increase His Personal Fortune by the Institution of Oppressive Monopolies

By Francis Bartlett

One who is conversant with Central American conditions and particularly with the manner in which the government of Nicaragua has been administered during the past fifteen years has very aptly remarked that Nicaragua is President Zelaya's show and that he is running it for the box office receipts only. That describes the situation with sufficient exactitude. Zelaya discovered many years ago that patriotism was the best paying business in Central America and he has laid in such large stocks of it and has traded in it with such conspicuous success that if he is compelled to retire from active life as the result of his present difficulties with the government of the United States, he will be luxuriously equipped for the remainder of his days. Zelaya placed Nicaragua on a paying basis long ago and his pretty little property has been yielding him fat dividends ever since. Perhaps he would not object so much to retirement, for it has always been the dream of Central American dictators and other successful traders to seek the gilded haunts of Paris in their declining years. It has been estimated that Zelaya is so well fortified against the traditional rainy day that he would suffer no particular discomfiture if Jupiter Pluvius should keep the heavens open continuously for the next generation.

Zelaya's first opportunity to coin his country into drachmas came in 1893 when he took the field with the Liberal forces against the government of Dr. Robert Sacasa. Allied with him in this revolution which was the turning point in his life were Generals Zavala and Montiel. The revolution was prettily managed and succeeded admirably and on the day that the allies entered Managua Dr. Sacasa wisely fled. A provisional government was established in the afternoon, but in the evening Zelaya heard the knock of opportunity and withdrew from the city at the head of his forces. He did this so secretly that when he appeared before the city bright and early next morning and demanded its surrender, Generals Zavala and Montiel were surprised and felt hurt besides. Zelaya cruelly trampled on their feelings by bombarding the city and the provisional government for two days, after which he entered Managua and declared himself the dictator. He hurt the feelings of Generals Zavala and Montiel still more deeply by throwing them into prison. Then he reorganized the administration, threw all of the Zavala and Montiel lieutenants into prison to keep their chiefs company, and issued a proclamation that Nicragua was about to develop its great natural resources.

Nicaragua was not long left in doubt about the strict truth telling of that proclamation. One of the greatest natural resources of Nicaragua is human life and Zelaya immediately began to develop the cash possibilities of human life. Armed with a copy of the Nicaraguan equivalent for Bradstreet's, he levied assessments on the wealthiest citizens of the country. Some paid up, thereby subjecting themselves to renewed assessments; some managed to get out of the country and have been weeping about the woes of their fatherland over coffee and cigarettes in the cafes of Paris, London and New York ever since; some refused to pay and were promptly thrown into prison. Now the Nicaraguan prisons have never been bothered by the attentions of any prison reform associations; they are not model prisons in any sense of the word. They are not sanitary and they are very wet; beds and bedding are usually overlooked; the food is bad and the water is worse. In fact, if one wanted to go to prison, one would not select a Nicaraguan prison. But for the development of the natural resources of Nicaragua, Zelaya found these prisons extremely useful. If a prisoner wanted to get out, he had only to pay the fee of freedom and if he had already impoverished himself by paying assessments to the government, the money of his commiserating friends was always acceptable to Zelaya. If the prisoners or their friends declined to pay, Zelaya, with the simple methods of genius, condemned whatever property they might possess and either sold it or confiscated it.

But Zelaya did not neglect other means of developing the natural resources of his beloved Nicaragua. He formed trusts. These trusts differ considerably from the bold, bad trusts of this country in this respect, that they are much bolder and worse. Zelaya had his legislative body pass laws against the buying or manufacturing of certain products unless obtained from certain companies named in the government decrees. These companies were placed in the hands of the government's representatives and Zelaya being the government, it is easy to understand what that meant. To put it plainly, Zelaya made it illegal for his subjects to buy or sell goods in which he was not personally interested. His personal interest was most fondly evinced in the sale of liquors, tobacco, dynamite, powder, hides and leather. Soap was another product which he monopolized; matches, too. Kerosene is the principal means of illumination in Nicaragua, gas being unknown and electricity in its infancy, so everybody who wants light in the darkness of Nicaragua must buy kerosene from Zelaya and at a stiff price, of course. For generations the natives along the coast made a living by evaporating sea water and manufacturing salt. Zelaya made this industry illegal and all Nicaraguans must obtain their salt from one of his companies.

It may be imagined that these trusts have netted President Zelaya a pretty income. There can be no doubt about that, but nobody knows how large his fortune is. That is a secret of state which he shares with none. It may be imagined, too, that many attempts have been made to break up the monopolies which he has established; but whenever a Nicaraguan trust buster made himself conspicuous, Zelaya sallied out at the head of his troops and maintained the stability of his business. Zelaya looks well in his gorgeous uniform and is partial to warfare as a recreation, just as John D. Rockefeller is partial to golf. It is quite likely that warfare as a recreation will become unpopular with him, however, before the United States gets through. It is quite likely, too, that some of his trusts will be busted; but Zelaya will not be too much chagrined. He has made his dictatorship for revenue only a conspicuously successful career and no doubt he yearns for Maxim's.

imposture or self-delusion is impossible, but while unable to explain them on any natural hypothesis, he would not admit that they were the results of supernatural agency. In other words, Dr. Mahon admitted the evidence of his own senses, but avoided any inference which was not logically clear. In Dr. Mahon's day there was as much scepticism about spiritualism as there is today, and at the same time there were men as well educated as William Stead who were convinced by the necromantic performances of mediums. The man who argues that because he knows nothing of the spiritual world, nothing can be known regarding it, has yet much to learn of the principles of philosophy. He who asserts that Mahomet was a lunatic and Moses an imposter, is on a mental par with the blind man that declares his disbelief in the sun.

  No liking more, nor any kisses now
  But they shall wake sweet shame upon your brow,

Trembling upon the verge of some new dawn

I who would fain call back the child that's gone.
And what you lost for me would have you keep,

The Spider

By Isabelle Kaiser (From the German)

I followed my wife to her apartments. She measured me with a vindictive glance. I saw that her hands trembled as she was undoing her wrap. But I did not respect her indignation. I had led her home from the theatre before the end of the performance, because the everlasting Monsieur de Boutteville insisted on paying his respects in our box during the intermissions, and it annoys me to see her face, which appears to me always rigidly hostile, grow gentle and sweet as she smiles a welcome to that man. Her steel-gray eyes sparkled with a flame which all my love and devotion had failed to kindle.

I heard whispers all around us; I felt each one of those malevolent looks as an insult. In that restrained domineering tone which she knows so well I ordered her to make ready.

She followed me, mutely rebellious, and we did not exchange a word as we drove home. I felt, however, that inwardly she was heaping upon me deadly insults.

She intended to slam the door of her apartment in my face, as she does every evening. But I entered with an enforced calmness, resolved to provoke an irrevocable encounter rather than to continue this humiliating silence.

"Barbara!"

She did not reply, but seemed to nerve herself for the impending scene. She was pacing the floor as if I did not exist, throwing a wristband on one chair, a chain on another, with the mien of a captive bursting her fetters.

"When will you cease to torture me with this coquetry?"

She laughed scornfully. "Again! When will you cease to annoy me with your suspicions?"

"Do you mean to say that these suspicions are unfounded?"

"Think what you please—but spare me further scenes, else—"

"Else what?"

"Pshaw! I don't know what. I guess else I will leave you."

"Barbara, would you do that?"

"Yes, and more, too."

"Take care!"

"You had better take care yourself! I hate you!"

Her face grew rigid with cold malignity, her words hissed through the air like a bullet. I recoiled, stunned with pain. It was not the first time that she had flung such words at me, but never before had I observed in them so mortal a hatred and so vengeful a menace.

I felt a sudden superiority over her by the virtue of the grace of my great love.

"You hate me? Very well! Do not forget that I love you."

She laughed sarcastically. "Such love, indeed! It stones with suspicion and kills with jealousy. I know another kind!"

"Silence, Barbara! Do not speak of that man! He is not worthy to walk in the dust you tread. He is an egotist—a—"

"I forbid you to malign him; he loves me!"

"Nonsense! Such men love themselves alone and are grateful to women only for what they deny them. Why did he not marry you when you were free?"

I bit my lips, but the sentence had slipped out of my mouth.

She rises indignantly. "How—you dare ask me that? Did you not marry me against my will, when I was almost engaged to Monsieur de Boutteville?"

"Ask your father!" I observed nonchalantly.

"The dead do not speak," she replied roughly.

"Neither shall I on the subject. You cannot force me into a lack of consideration. You might rue it."

"As you have rued the rich dowry?" she whispered with cowardly irony.

I remained calm under this insult. When the bow is too tensely drawn by a hand that lacks skill the arrow often misses its mark.

"You do not know what you are saying, Barbara. It is high time, however, that we take leave of these surroundings and of this frivolous turmoil. Monday we shall go to our country house. Do you hear me?"

She rose to full height and said plainly and decisively: "I will not!"

Her open resistance made my blood boil.

"Then confess that you cannot live without meeting this man in society!"

"I confess! I confess!" she exclaimed in growing anger.

"You confess that you love him?"

"You have said so!"

An oppressive silence followed this defiant confession. My wrath broke out like wildfire. I seized her hands with force and warned her: "I am not the man to bear the sneers of the world. I will do all, all, do you understand? to separate you from that man, to free you from his venomous influence! He is having his sport with you, he is seeking to entrap you. I will find an opportunity to insult him and thus force him to challenge me. You know my skill with the pistol!"

"You will not do that?"

"I certainly will do that."

"It would be no duel—it would be a murder!"

"What does it matter? Does that man recoil from the thoughts of assassinating my honor and your reputation?"

"I shall know how to guard that."

"And how, pray?" I demanded in a kind of a challenge.

A glance of passionate hatred met me, and with a hoarse cry that came from her lips like a threat, she replied: "We'll see!" She quickly stepped into an adjoining room and bolted the door.

Sitting in my study I hear her pace the floor above me. A hurricane must be raging in her breast. God knows what devilish plan the power of hatred will mature in her passionate nature.

I feel that I am somewhat to blame. I have been rude; I have spoken to her too harshly, as if she had been guilty of wrong-doing. I have overstepped the bounds, have acted as if she had sunk into the abyss. I have afforded some justification for her vindictiveness, and she will surely avenge herself.

It was only under the lash of my suspicion that she flung her defiant confession into my face. Her thoughts are untrue to me, her soul is hostile to me; but everything points to the fact that she is pure and only imagines, in her infatuation, that she loves that man. Have I the right to reveal to her the true state of affairs? What humiliation that would be to her! How she would hate the man who would so deeply humble her! And yet this revelation would show her the true soul of that man whom she has placed on a pedestal and would force her to acknowledge the unselfishness of my love. Who knows? Perhaps in the house that was the home of her childhood, in the calm repose of pastoral scenes, some beautiful evening, when the chimes of the village church ring out some gentle psalm of hope

The Caddishness of a Genius

Some Sidelights on the Personality of William Watson, the Poet Who Made Himself Infamous by Traducing His Hostess

By Robert McTavish

William Watson has been writing good poetry for many years, but not until last week did he give incontrovertible proof of true genius. This he did by divulging to the world the inspiration of his poem, "The Woman With the Serpent's Tongue." It requires either genius or stupidity for a man to write himself down a cad, and William Watson is not wanting in brains. When his now famous poem was published it was supposed that he had done nothing worse than was done by Dean Swift when that most eccentric of geniuses lampooned the Queen's favorite, the Duchess of Somerset. It was supposed that Watson had merely embalmed in verse a little of the pungent gossip of London with reference to the evil practice of a female meddler in British politics, but nobody, except perhaps those on the inside, suspected that the poet had done something even worse than employ his muse in the service of detraction for the humiliation of a woman. According to the poet's own confession, however, he is guilty of a meanness so contemptible that it is hard to characterize it in polite language. He admits that what he knows of Lady Asquith to her discredit he learned as her guest in her own home, and this is the material that forms the substance of his poem. How a man with any sense of decency could be guilty of so flagrant and ugly a violation of the social code it is difficult to conceive. It seems uncharitable to assume that the man who has thus incurred the world's scorn is of sound mind. Certainly the situation in which the poet presents himself is as pathetic as it is repulsive. From Watson's confession it is evident that his conduct is marked by that eccentricity of the genius that borders on lunacy..

The naivete of his confession is characteristic of genius. Poets and men of genius generally, since the days of David, have been astonishing the world by the singularity of their behaviour. What Watson has done is probably not worse than what was done by Voltaire, who ridiculed his benefactress, Ninon De L'Enclos, after she had given him money to buy books.

In view of Watson's caddishness it is interesting to recall that one of the most impressive of his poems is entitled "The Things That Are More Excellent." In this poem he declares there is nothing nobler than to be free. Considering his utter disregard of one of the most sacred of social conventions, the sincerity of these sentiments is not to be questioned:

> And in appropriate dust he hurled
> That dull, punctilious god, whom they
> That call their tiny clan the world,
> Serve and obsequiously obey:
> Who con their ritual of Routine,
> With minds to one dead likeness blent,
> And never ev'n in dreams have seen
> The things that are more excellent.
> To dress, to call, to dine, to break
> No canon of the social code,
> The little laws that lacqueys make,
> The futile decalogue of Mode,—
> How many a soul for these things lives,
> With pious passion grave intent!
> While Nature careless-handed gives
> The things that are more excellent.

William Watson is a self-educated man. Until his twelfth year, owing to physical delicacy, he was unable to attend school. His father, a Liverpool merchant, devoted more attention to the development of his body than to that of his mind. The poet gained education for himself from long, unbroken hours of companionship with the poets, and from constant rambles along the Lancashire sea coast and frequent excursions into the country immortalized by Wordsworth. From his earliest youth he has been a passionate lover of poetry and a tireless student of the poets, and much of this study has been carried forward, not in a library, but afield, amid some of the most beautiful scenery in England. Although Mr. Watson's taste is catholic, Shelley and Keats were the masters of his youth, and exercised the greatest influence over him during the formative period. Wordsworth came later, but with a spell not less potent. He has characterized the service of the three great singers to him in these lines:

> "The first voice, then the second, in their turns
> Had sung me captive. This voice sang me free."

One of the most notable of Watson's poems is that on Wordsworth's grave. This is the poem that was alluded to in the press despatches the other day as the one that was admired by Mrs. Asquith. Here are some specimen stanzas:

> A hundred years ere he to manhood came,
> Song from celestial heights had wandered down,
> Put off her robe of sunlight, dew and flame,
> And donned a modish dress to charm the Town.
> Thenceforth she but festooned the porch of things;
> Apt at life's lore, incurious what life meant.
> Dextrous of hand, she struck her lutes few strings;
> Ignobly perfect, barrenly content.
> * * * * * * *
> And idly tuneful, the loquacious throng
> Flutter and twitter, prodigal of time,
> And little masters make a toy of song
> Till grave men weary of the sound of rhyme.
> And some go prankt in faded antique dress,
> Abhorring to be hale and glad and free;
> And some parade a conscious naturalness,
> The scholar's not the child's simplicity.
> * * * * * * *
> Not such the authentic Presence pure, that made
> This valley vocal in the great days gone!—
> In his great days, while yet the spring-time played
> About him, and the mighty morning shone.
> No word-mosaic artificer, he sang
> A lofty song of lowly weal and dole.
> Right from the heart, right to the heart it sprang,
> Or from the soul leapt instant to the soul.
> He felt the charm of childhood, grace of youth,
> Grandeur of age insisting to be sung.
> The impassioned argument was simple truth.
> Half wondering at its own melodious tongue.
> Impassioned, ay, to the songs ecstatic core!
> But far removed were clangour, storm and feud;
> For plenteous health was his, exceeding store
> Of joy, and an impassioned quietude.

Watson's first volume of verse, "The Prince's Quest," was published in 1880. It was unheralded and did not excite wide interest, but the few who read it with open minds found it strong in intellectual quality and touched in parts with genuine power of imagination. In 1884 a second volume came from the same hand, under the title, "Epigrams of Art, Life and Nature," rich in clear characterizations and in condensed and beautiful phrase. After an interval of six years, "Wordsworth's Grave and Other Poems" appeared, and not only confirmed the impression of poetic power made by the earlier verse, but greatly deepened and widened that impression. The notable poem which gave its title to the volume did not fail to command attention from those who are quick to see and recognize not only what is new but what is true. Attention was directed to Watson at the time of Tennyson's death when he was regarded as a possible candidate for the position of Poet Laureate. He wrote an elegy on Tennyson to which Mr. Gladstone gave official recognition by awarding him £200 from the Royal Bounty Fund. The latest volume of Watson's poetry was brought out a month ago and is reviewed in the Saturday Review that came to hand a week ago. This critical journal has made no allusion to Watson's "The Woman with the Serpent's Tongue," but damns his book of verse with faint praise. The reviewer says that his limits in the matter of passion have been long evident, but that compensation is to be found in that charm of lucid austerity which alone makes him rare among contemporary versifiers. Nevertheless he is pronounced a static poet, and "static poets," says the reviewer, "are out of place in a dynamic age."

The Spectator

The Fascinating Dimmick Case

Those who take delight in what the exponents of yellow journalism call human interest stories may find much to gratify their taste in the case of Walter Dimmick who was convicted of the theft of $30,000 from the local branch of the United States Mint in which he was employed as assistant cashier. Into a brief period of Dimmick's life have been crowded many vicissitudes of the kind out of which is fashioned realistic, emotional drama that tugs at the heart-strings and chokes the susceptible with emotions. Dimmick has emerged from the gloomy walls of the penitentiary at San Quentin, where he spent six years of his life, and he is now embarked on a new career in this city. A more striking and impressive figure to vitalize a drama with it would be hard to conceive. There is about him that air of profound resolution, indomitable perseverence and sublime patience that makes for effectiveness in dramatic heroes, but it is more the warm color of circumstance than the qualities of a personality that appeal in the case of Walter Dimmick. The case itself has all of that fascination for the mind which is inherent in studies of tragic episodes. It presents at the outset a problem of absorbing interest, the problem involving the question of Dimmick's guilt or innocence. Affirmative proof of Dimmick's guilt, be it known, though he was convicted and though he has served his sentence, has never been produced. He protested his innocence through all the years of his incarceration, and perhaps the most singular of all the circumstances connected with his case is that during his imprisonment he inspired the conviction among all his fellow convicts and among all the officers of the penitentiary that a guiltless man was paying the penalty of another's crime.

His Life in the Penitentiary

It is not unusual for convicts to proclaim their innocence and bewail the cruelty and injustice of their fate. But it is seldom that a convict who insists that he is innocent brings conviction to the minds of his associates. There is a grim sense of humor in penitentiaries, and it is invariably indulged at the expense of those self-styled unfortunates who rail at the cruel fates and the blind vindictiveness of savage justice. Behind the prison walls there is none of the charity that mitigates the miseries of sinners. There society is all of one class—all are reprobates, and the convict who affects the air of an innocent man is scoffed at, and burning brands are heaped upon his head. It is hard to dissemble successfully where men are thrown in such close contact as at San Quentin, where every man is constantly under the eye of his fellows, where his silence is more eloquent than his speech and even his dreams are heard. All of which imparts significance to the fact that Walter Dimmick has left behind him in San Quentin the impression that he is guiltless of the crime for which he has suffered disgrace and ignominy. This impression he did not create by appeals to sympathy or by denials of his guilt. He is not the man to whine. He endured his fate with patience, with fortitude, without lamentation and without complaint. At first he worked in the jute mill, and he worked hard and faithfully. He was always amiable but seldom sociable. His clerical ability soon won him a position in the commisary department and there too his behaviour was exemplary. He was never inclined to dicuss his affairs, but in the course of time it became known that he had consecrated himself to one purpose, that of vindicating himself and establishing his claim upon the respect of his fellow men. While in San Quentin influential friends of Dimmick interested themselves in his behalf, and they succeeded in getting a promise of a pardon for him on condition that he should confess his guilt. This he refused to do. Strong pressure was brought to bear upon him, but in vain.

The Last Act

Dimmick's conviction was effected by what is known as the process of elimination. To the satisfaction of a jury it was made to appear that it was impossible for any of the other men in the department of the mint in which he was employed to have stolen the money. Suspicion pointed to him by reason of but one circumstance; he had been seen leaving the mint with a suit case in his hand. He explained that the case contained a suit of clothes, but the explanation was not accepted. The fact of the matter appears to be that somebody had to be convicted. Uncle Sam had been robbed of a large sum of money; a very dangerous example this, and the government had to set another example to teach its employees the hazardousness of separating Uncle Sam from his money. To this end William J. Burns was sent to San Francisco to work up a case against somebody. It was as a gatherer of evidence in the Dimmick case that this man of curious scruples first appeared in our midst, and it was Burns that succeeded in sending Dimmick to the penitentiary. Dimmick is now a clerk in a law office in this city, and his friends say that he is as firm as ever in his resolution to prove his innocence of the crime. Their confidence in him has never been shaken, and they believe that he will succeed in bringing to light evidence that will serve as material for a thrilling wind-up for the drama in which he is figuring. To prove his innocence, of course, he will have to prove the guilt of some one. That there is some one who has not been sleeping peacefully since Dummick shed his stripes is the belief not only of Dimmick's friends but of many lawyers who are familiar with the methods by which his conviction was procured.

Rumors About Chief Cook

The political writers of the morning papers have a brand new story every day about the approaching removal of Chief of Police Cook from the position which he has filled with such success. I sincerely hope that the new police commissioners, whoever they may turn out to be, will have the good sense to retain Chief Cook in his present position. But I do not think anybody knows just what the Mayor-elect and his political intimates intend to do in this or in any other department of the municipal government. McCarthy is keeping his own counsel with unusual closeness, a fact which is shown by the wide variety of guesses as to his appointments which the political writers are making. I doubt whether even Chief Cook has any positive information as to what is going to happen to him. Of course, he might send out some of his detectives to get the "low-down," but I don't think they would meet with any more success than the journalistic sleuths. The hawkshaws of the police department are expert enough in their own field of crime investigation, but they flounder hopelessly when assigned to any work outside of the routine. I have in mind the occasion recently when two of the upper office men were detailed to attend the performance of the frisky "Girl from Rector's" and make a report to the chief as to its moral tone. I met them on their way back to police headquarters, and a few minutes' conversation convinced me that they did not relish their role of censorship. They were much embarrassed when I asked them what they thought of the show. "It was very suggestchive, very suggestchive," replied one of them. "If I had a clean daughter, I wouldn't let her go to see it," opined the other.

"Kid" Sullivan and the Rubberneck Wagon

While I am on this subject of the police I might recommend to the attention of our peace authorities the remarkable interest which the notorious "Kid" Sullivan seems to take in the daily trips of the "rubberneck wagon," the sightseeing automobile which starts from Market street near Fourth every day. The "Kid" seems to be fascinated by the excursions made by this big motor bus. Time and time again I have noticed him standing across the street watching it with alert attention. His attention is particularly keen when the bus is pretty well filled with sightseers and the chauffeur is about to start. At such times the "Kid" seems to grow nervous, for he makes peculiar gestures, as though he were talking to somebody in the bus with code signs. Now I happen to know that rustic sightseers have come back to their downtown hotels after a trip in the rubberneck wagon, sadder but wiser men. The trip not only makes them acquainted with the beauties of the city but also with some of the ugly traits of human character. I suggest that the police interview the "Kid" who is a most interesting talker on certain subjects, with the purpose of plucking the heart out of this everyday mystery of Market street.

The Old Flower Vendors

I wonder if the old flower vendors will ever return to the sidewalk in front of the Chronicle building and to the open space around Lotta's fountain. Sometimes I am inclined to think that this old attraction has gone never to return, like the cocktail route; but at other times I am not so sure. There are one or two vendors who do a modest trade in violets near the turntable right now; perhaps others will follow their example until the gorgeous colors of chrysanthemums, carnations, roses and other beautiful flowers will gladden our eyes as of yore. The old flower dealers who banked their baskets along the curb at Market and Kearny streets did a thriving business and I would not be surprised if some of them are now quite well-to-do. I have heard people speak of that charming feature of downtown life in the most unlikely parts of the world; the riot of exquisite blooms at reasonable prices appealed strongly to the imagination and the pocketbooks of tourists. That old scene was painted by many artists, and it vies with the similar scene in front of St. Martin's in the Fields in London in the memory of lovers of the picturesque. But the vendors took a great deal of business away from the regular florists and it is quite likely that these would renew their objections if the old flower market were revived.

King is Adamant to Humor

Speaking of the flower vendors reminds me of a good story about Mr. L. M. King of whom I have had occasion to speak recently. It shows that to joke with Mr. King or at the expense of Mr. King is a rather futile pursuit. There is no joint in the King armor of seriousness through which the barb of a jest may enter. Mr. King is clothed in matter-of-fact as in a sober garment. A certain attorney realized this rather forcibly several years ago. It was at the time that the florists of the city were endeavoring to have the flower vendors prohibited by ordinance from selling their blooms about Lotta's Fountain. This attorney represented the florists while King appeared for the Merchants' Association in opposition to the ordinance. To make the new regulation conform to the Charter without interfering with the flower vendors King proposed that a clause be inserted in the ordinance providing that the flower stands should be removed between the hours of 8 p. m. and 2. a. m. The attorney for the florists, realizing that his cause was hopeless, grew facetious and suggested that this clause was no doubt necessary as the members of Mr. King's association would need all of the sidewalk and street between those hours. King was greatly distressed by this reflection on the navigating abilities of the members of the Merchants' Association. "I assure your honorable board," he said most earnestly, "that there was no such idea in our minds when this clause was inserted in the ordinance. The habits of the members of the Merchants' Association are most exemplary."

A Professor on Bret Harte

While Mr. L. M. King, secretary of the Merchants' Association, as noted in these columns last week, has only just learned that Bret Harte is dead, Professor Josiah Royce of Harvard is to the fore with a magazine article in which he demonstrates to his own satisfaction that Harte's fame has endured altogether too long. Royce is a Californian by birth and has written a great deal about this State; no doubt they regard him in the East as an authority upon our history, manners and morals. I do not know whether the East was impressed when Royce wrote: "Not one childhood memory of mine suggests any social incident or situation that in the slightest degree gives meaning or confirmation to Bret Harte's stories." In California we are not a bit impressed. We have no doubt that the statement is perfectly accurate. But in making it Royce did not impair the value of Bret Harte's literary achievement; he merely indicated the wide difference between the childhood memories of one born to be a university pedant and one destined to be an immortal story writer. If Royce had seen the early life of California as Bret Harte saw it—with the eye of imaginative insight—he would probably be now a famous writer instead of a stupid Harvard professor.

A Leaf Out of Barnum's Book

P. T. Barnum, the most successful of circus managers, gave utterance many years ago to the dictum that the people loved to be fooled. He attributed his success in the circus business to his persistent efforts in catering to this passion. Having observed for some years the methods and practices of our thrifty pugilists and their shrewd managers I have come to the conclusion that they have found it profitable to adhere strictly to the principle by which the candid Barnum was guided; and the conviction has been strengthened by the character of the preparations that are being made for the Johnson-Jeffries fight. The successful bidder has agreed to give both pugilists a large percentage of the profits to accrue from exhibitions of the moving pictures of the contest. In the circumstances it would be highly absurd to expect the fighters to fight in earnest from the very start. It will be to their interest to give a performance which will look good in the moving pictures. To that end they will do as fighters have done before—they will spar gracefullv for several rounds; they will insure the success of the moving pictures before either of them attempts to knock the other out; and in all the circumstances of the affair it may well be doubted whether the fight will be on the square at any stage of the proceedings. But to the credit of the managers and the fighters, be it said, they have practiced very little, if any, deception on the dear people. They have at least revealed enough to make it clear that it will be to the interest of the fighters to keep the moving pictures in mind. Nevertheless Barnum's dictum will be verified.

Edith—Oh, Percy, your present was so beautiful! And you unintentionally left the price-tag on—forty dollars.

Percy—Oh, how careless of me!"

Edith—And I see you bought it at Sellum's. And I know you wouldn't mind taking it back and exchanging it for one of those lovely forty-dollar brooches they have there, would you?

Percy—Oh, not at all! With pleasure!

Percy (an hour later, in his room)—That is what comes of buying a four-dollar ring and sticking a forty-dollar tag on it. Now I've got to buy the brooch or lose the girl.

Immoral San Mateo

Amazing news has been pouring in on us from San Mateo County. That beautiful suburb of the gay and incorrigible metropolis teems, we are told, with villains, sombre, sorrow-evoking villains, who have formed a political plunderbund for the looting of the village treasury. This is well nigh incredible. San Mateo is a padded and scented seat of culture. It is fertile in all the essentials of refinement and luxury. It is in San Mateo County that Burlingame flourishes like an Assyrian garden of eternal blossoms. San Mateo is the Mecca of all San Franciscans that are animated with social ambition. Moreover, it is within hailing distance of Palo Alto whence the good David Starr Jordan radiates by the bushel sentiments that ennoble and purify. And yet, mirabile dictu! within the confines of San Mateo there is a private citizen as ridiculous as Boke of Berkeley, and as intent as was that self-ordained redeemer of mankind upon diffusing terror and inducing intimidation. It appears that there is a row on in San Mateo between rival banks over the privilege of handling the public funds, and that one Adolph Jacobs, who is probably envious of the fame of Isidore of that ilk, deems it expedient to wreak vengeance on somebody's head. Somebody has been guilty of a technical violation of the law, and Adolph is indulging a pretty passion for indignation meetings and a salutary revival of recollections of the days of '49 when innocent men were hounded by intemperate and ferocious patriots, some of whom were greater scoundrels than the men they murdered. From the amazing agonies of the league of justice that Boke fathers has resulted a kindly predisposition to grin at the Jacobs outfit in San Mateo, but perhaps it might be well to discourage busy-bodies of the Boke-Jacobs temperament. There is a very good counter-irritant for cases of the lawless zeal for indignation meetings designed to incite communities beyond control of the constituted authorities. It is the old fashioned plaster composed of tar and feathers. It is an instantaneous cure.

The Evanishment of Boodler Gallagher

The news of "Big Jim" Gallagher's disappearance from town was received with the same equanimity with which an apathetic and surfeited community learned of Abe Ruef's discharge from the custody of the sheriff on the ground, among others, that the atmosphere of the county jail was injurious to his morals. Apparently nobody cares if "Big Jim" ever comes back, and the most vindictive of the dailies are disposed to discuss Ruef's case in whispers as though fearful of waking justice. It is said that Gallagher has not abandoned the scenes of his triumphs and treacheries, but it is somewhat singular that he should have left town surreptitiously, as hitherto he has been given permission to go when the impulse seized him, his return being insured by the swag that was kept in a safe-deposit box to which he had access only in the presence of a detective. There is more than one curious circumstance in connection with Gallagher's disappearance. The relaxation of vigilance on the part of two detectives is one of them, and Mr. Langdon's tardiness in making the discovery that his chief witness had levanted is another. The question has been asked whether it may not be possible that the men who released the grafter's boodle and facilitated his departure were eager that he should take himself hence. The suspicion prevails that there is in Gallagher's possession much information which could be utilized to the disadvantages and uneasiness of some very distinguished citizens.

Heney's Libel Suit

If the enemies of the Hon. Francis J. Heney credited him with sincerity they would rejoice at the pregnant prospect which he has unfolded to their view by his suit for libel against Mr. William H. Crocker. But there is probably not one among them so abundantly supplied with credulity as to believe that the repudiated friend of the pee-pul intends to prosecute that suit to a finish. Conscious though they are of the protracted and prodigious strain which Mr. Heney's nervous system has endured in consequence of his extravagant efforts to gratify the morbid whims of his masters, they are hardly prepared to believe that he has entirely exhausted his fund of discretion. Libel suits have something of the character of the boomerang, and as little as Mr. Heney knows of the law he is not insensible of the hazard that is incurred by those who prove themselves less timid than angels by rushing into court to obtain from the blind goddess a certificate of character. That Mr. Heney is a man of discretion we know because of the utter failure of his enemies to induce him to take up for discussion the subject of the mysterious receipt which he gave to the Contra Costa Water Company. It was discretion of the highest order that kept Mr. Heney as dumb as an oyster during all the time that he was taunted about that receipt. So now it is too severe a tax on the credulity of his enemies to ask them to believe that Mr. Heney will actually go into court and dare Mr. Crocker not only to present a panoramic view of the doings of the Graft Prosecution but also to challenge his estimate of the value of his reputation. Mr. Heney demands judgment for a quarter of a million dollars, thus implying that he believes he has a reputation of exceptional purity. And thus it would appear that Mr. Crocker is to be afforded the delightful opportunity of undeceiving him in the same manner as was Martin Kelly undeceived by William R. Hearst. Kelly was more modest than Heney. He believed that his reputation was worth not more than $50,000 but the jury that tried his libel suit found that he was out in his reckoning to the extent of $49,998. Now Mr. Heney appears to have invited a similar disillusionment, but of course this is a case in which appearance may prove decidedly deceptive. A man with so much confidence in himself as he has always exhibited may feel that a libel suit is notice to the world that he is conscious of his rectitude and that the prosecution of it is a work of supererogation. But in the interest of the community it would be well for Mr. Crocker, as a public spirited citizen, to seize the opportunity afforded and apply at once for commissions to take testimony. Let us have, if possible, a little cross-examination of our civic patriots and of those unparalleled representatives of the American judiciary—Lawlor and Dunne. Make haste, Mr. Crocker, like a good fellow, before anybody has a chance to run out on you.

Fulton on Dunne

If ever Senator Fulton of Oregon and Judge Frank Dunne meet face to face there will immediately occur some kind of spectacular performance, for Judge Dunne has taken a contract to insult everybody who has made an attempt to characterize him fittingly, and Senator Fulton is among those who have not realized the futility of this task. Some days ago Senator Fulton delivered an address before the Bar Association of Portland during the course of which he animadverted upon the amazing character of the administration of justice in San Francisco. With reference to the trial of Eugene Schmitz, he said: "Of the trial judge I hesitate to speak, lest, mistaking ignorance for infamy, I shall express myself in language too severe, or mistaking infamy for ignorance, I shall condemn his conduct not sufficiently. Macaulay, speaking of Bertrand Barere, said: 'In almost every particular sort of wickedness he had rivals. There may have been,' he said, 'men as cowardly as he, some as cruel, a few as mean, a few as impudent. There may also have been as great liars as he, though we have never met with them or read of them. But when we put everything together, sensuality, poltroonery, baseness, effrontery, mendacity, barbarity, the result is something which,

It remains only to add that had it fallen to the lot of Macaulay to read the record in the case of the People vs. Schmitz, he would have either modified or qualified in some respects his famous denunciation of Barere."

The Chivalrous Le Gallienne

When a man is down it isn't a commendable quality of enthusiasm that impels the kicking of him. Nor is it significant of a chivalrous spirit to contribute to the humiliation of one who has brought overwhelming humiliation and immortal shame upon himself. William Watson has fallen from a great height, a much greater height than Richard Le Gallienne will ever be able to attain, and his plight must excite the compassion of everybody accessible to that emotion. Unfortunately for Richard Le Gallienne, incapable of appreciating the tragic piteousness of poor Watson's downfall, with an unseemly relish he constitutes himself a knight-errant under the impression that the spirit of chivalry demands the chastisement of the defenseless. It would be highly flattering to compare his inspiration with that which moved Don Quixote to espouse the cause of an imaginary Dulcinea. Cervantes' hero though foolish was magnanimous, his judgment was no worse and his taste much better than that of the man who, while unconsciously emulating the ass that kicked the dead lion, hails himself a hero and the helpless object of his onslaught a coward. Le Gallienne reminds me of the heartless mob that hooted poor Wilde on his way to Reading Jail. The charitable will assume that Watson, who has never been in robust health and who has suffered from nervous disorders, is more to be pitied than abused. At any rate it is useless to moralize on behaviour that is obviously discreditable. Watson's mind like that of Blake's and of other poets who were absorbed in their ideal and who concentrated too much attention on their work, finds an apt image in the moon partially eclipsed, a glorious luminary unbedimmed in its lucid part but in the other distinctly reft of light. A man of high poetic genius, the intrinsic greatness of whose work is patent and irrefutable, he has been guilty of a fatal error of judgment conclusive of a curious obliquity of moral vision, but his offense carries with it its own penalty

They Canonized a Horse Thief

The piratical "St." Francis Drake is not the only queer character in the history of California nomenclature, for it is noted in the official history of Contra Costa County that when the time came for determining the names of localities within its boundaries there was one who stood stoutly for naming the highest peak Mount San Diablo for what seemed to him a good and sufficient reason, namely that no Spanish name was complete without the San or Santa. In early days there was a point on the Marin shore called Puenta de Quentin after an Indian horse thief who made it his headquarters. About 1849 or 1850 some newly arrived Argonauts settled there and proceeded to canonize the horse thief, under the delusion that the saintly prefix had been mislaid. The little town of Concord in Contra Costa records another successful protest against a Spanish title. The original settlement was at Pacheco at the confluence of two creeks, but after several disastrous winter floods the owner of some adjacent land offered inducements for a migration of which many availed themselves. The new town was named officially Todos Santos, but the title was not pleasing to a considerable number. For some reason the site had been known as Drunken Indian, and the protestants declared that for choice they would prefer to date their letters and receive their mail at Drunken Indian rather than at Todos Santos. The dispute was carried on acrimoniously, neither side being willing to yield and finally one of the Martinez newspapers began making sarcastic references to "our neighbors at Concord." The bit of pleasantry had the effect of a compromise, for the new name was adopted.

The Death of Father Tabb

It seems very strange and very sad to me that the newspapers should have overlooked the passing away of that gentle priest and true poet, Father John Tabb. For years the editors of the best magazines have been eager to publish the quatrains and brief lyrics in which Father Tabb embodied his gentle inspirations. Few who read these verses would imagine that the author, whose soul breathed only piety, resignation and love, had passed through a stirring career. Father Tabb served as a blockade runner during the Civil War. He belonged to a fine Southern family and was heart and soul with the Confederate cause. In after life he told many amusing stories of his experiences. On one occasion when he was running the blockade in a Northern port, a Southern colonel was aboard during a dangerous cannonade from the Union fort. "That is pretty firing," remarked the colonel, sitting calmly on the wheelhouse, as a shot whizzed by. "This is very pretty firing," he declared, as a second shot ricocheted over his head. And when a shell burst on the deck he arose and drawled with emphasis, "If that isn't the prettiest firing I ever saw. I wish I may be damned." During one of the voyages Tabb was consoling a negro pilot who had left his wife sick at home. "But the ole 'oman is mighty sick, Master Johnny, and I don't expec' to see her no more," sobbed the pilot. Johnny Tabb was silent in the presence of this great sorrow, but presently the old man said: "Dere some mighty pretty yaller girls where we's a-goin', Master Johnny." As a prisoner of war in a Union jail in Maryland, Tabb made the acquaintance of Sidney Lanier, also a prisoner, and the two became life-long friends. After release from prison, Tabb studied for the Episcopalian ministry, but he was drawn to the Catholic church and finally took orders in that faith. For years he was professor of letters in a Catholic college in Maryland. Some time ago he became blind, but this terrible affliction never impaired his sunny geniality and he remained until death the best-beloved of the faculty

George Sterling Was His Pupil

It is not generally known that George Sterling was one of the pupils of Father Tabb. Sterling as a young man attended the Catholic college of St. Charles near Ellicott City in Maryland and there he came under the influence of the poet-priest. It would be interesting to know how much of Sterling's poetical eminence is due to the inspiration of this communion. Of course Father Tabb did not make a poet of Sterling; Sterling was born with the divine fire. But he undoubtedly contributed to the refinement of Sterling's taste. Speaking of the dead priest Sterling said the other day: "He was the author of the purest lyric verse ever written in America. When he was my teacher he used to make me memorize poetry by the page. He was the homeliest man living and one of the shyest. Charles Warren Stoddard had an immense appreciation for him."

"Aren't you going home?" asked a fellow club member.
"Not for several days," answered Mr. Snooks. "I'm going to give my family a chance to forget. You see, mother and the girls have been trying to educate me to an appreciation of classical music. This afternoon I heard a terrific racket on the piano, so being anxious to please, I half closed my eyes and said, 'Isn't it perfectly beautiful'?"
"Wasn't that all right?"
"No. It was the piano tuner."

The Anglican Seceders of Graymoor

Quite recently eighteen Anglican monks and a company of Episcopalian nuns embraced the Roman Catholic faith and the religious journals are greatly exercised over the significance of this wholesale secession. Both of the communities are located near Garrison, New York. The monastic body is known as the Society of the Atonement and is under the leadership of Father Paul whose secular name is Lewis Wattson. The nuns are called the Sisters of the Atonement and their convent is about one mile distant from Father Paul's monastery. The reception of the monks in a body is a special privilege granted by the pope through the influence of Monsignor Falconio, the apostolic delegate at Washington. Father Paul and his followers will join the Franciscan order and will continue their monastic life as before. Because Father Paul has been a leading advocate in this country of the corporate reunion of the Anglican Church with the Roman see, great significance has been attached to his conversion and the conversion of his followers, by certain religious editors. Others make light of it, declaring that Father Paul's propaganda has been an embarrassment which is now terminated by the severance of his Anglican ties. That some of the religious editors have been rendered uneasy by the secession is quite apparent. No church likes to lose its sincere workers; yet there has been a steady flow of Anglicans to the Catholic communion. Only a short time ago the Anglican sisterhood of St. Katharine's in Queen's Square, London, consisting of six sisters and ten embroidery-school workers, did exactly what the New York sisterhood has done. The great question in the minds of the Anglican editors of this country seems to be: Will the Graymoor movement spread?

The New Merchant Marine League

There are only eleven vessels flying the American flag engaged in the foreign cross-sea service of this country. England has more than eleven thousand. This is one of the humiliating facts which have made the organization of merchant marine leagues necessary in the United States. California has undertaken her share of the work required to restore the Stars and Stripes to the seas. The Merchant Marine League of California was started at the beginning of November and is rapidly gaining membership. At its head is Frank B. Anderson, president of the Bank of California; the vice-presidents are R. P. Schwerin, Captain John Barneson and C. C. Moore; Albert E. Castle is the treasurer; and C. C. Henion secretary. On the executive committee are George W. Dickie, James McNab, Fred C. Parker, Andrew Carrigan, F. W. Van Sicklen, James Rolph Jr. and J. A. McGregor. With such men enlisted in the cause the propaganda is bound to advance rapidly. The league is to be congratulated on having obtained a real live newspaperman in the person of David Paul, formerly the marine editor of the Chronicle, as its publicity agent. How Reuter's Started

The recent death of Baron G. de Reuter, the younger son of the founder of "Reuter's," recalls a romantic story of the origin of the great news agency. In 1850 Werner von Siemens, a German electrical engineer, was commissioned to lay the first telegraph line between Verviers and Cologne, and soon after the work was commenced, received a call from a young woman who begged him to desist. With tears in her eyes she told him that the telegraph would ruin her husband's business and reduce him to penury, for he was conducting a huge and successful pigeon post between Brussels and Aix la Chapelle. Von Siemens explained to the devoted wife the impossibility of staying the progress of science for the sake of any one, but told her that if her husband would convert the pigeons into pie and go to London he would furnish valuable introductions which would enable him to establish a news agency. The ex-pigeon post man, whose name was Reuter, accepted the advice and so successful was his news line that in the course of a few years he acquired a fortune as well as a title.

To Save the Seals from Extinction

The United States government is just now engaged in the wise and commendable task of saving the fur seals of the Pacific Ocean from extermination. That it is high time to take some action of the kind may be inferred from the fact that when this country bought Alaska from Russia there were about four million seals on the Pribyloff Islands while now there are less than two hundred thousand and this number is rapidly diminishing. The Japanese poachers are blamed for the wholesale slaughter of the seals. There is an arbitration ruling which prescribes a sixty mile zone about the Pribyloff Islands within which American and British hunters may not venture but the Japanese pelagic sealers are not hindered by the treaty and they are actually immune from interference within the zone of so-called immunity. Some time ago a board of experts was appointed to deal with the question and it contemplates an international conference for the purpose of formulating international game laws which will preserve not only the seals but all the other mammals of the sea, including whales, walruses, sea lions, and sea elephants. David Starr Jordan is a member of this commission.

Jordan's Peculiar Fitness

Now the president of Stanford is a very learned pundit who knows something about everything that is and a deal about things that are not. It has always been supposed that his specialty consisted in the study of fishes. Perhaps that is why he was appointed on this seal commission. I remember very vividly that Jordan served on a seal-commission once before, under President Cleveland, if I am not mistaken. If the fact had been remembered in Washington I doubt whether he would be serving again, for Jordan was not a conspicuous success on that former occasion. Jordan went to the seal rookeries and cast his eye over the situation. He noticed that one of the islands used by the seals as a breeding ground was covered with muck and he ordered that the muck should be cleared away. The order was executed but from that day to this no seals have used that island for breeding or any other purpose. For some reason or other Jordan ordered that a wire fence should be erected about another of the rookery islands. The result was that thousands of seals beat themselves to death against the obstruction. I am eager to learn what Doctor Jordan's latest suggestion will be.

Merle's Latest Play

Martin V. Merle, the young playwright of this city who wrote "The Light Eternal" which enjoyed a very successful run in different parts of the country, has entered the lists with a new play in which Richard Jose is to be starred. The piece had its premiere recently in Bridgeport, Connecticut, and the reports which have come to me indicate that it is going to be a decided success. the play is called "Silver Threads," and is commended in a review which I have seen, for its homeliness, directness and heart interest. Dick Jose plays the part of a simple-hearted blacksmith and sings "Silver Threads Among the Gold" and other favorite songs which the public never wearies of. I sincerely hope that Merle's new play will have a New York production, for he is a serious worker at his chosen craft and his success will naturally redound to the credit of the city of his birth.

The English Play Censorship

After all the hub-bub caused by the appointment of a parliamentary committee to investigate the censorship of dramatic productions in England, it has been decided that the censor shall remain but that authors, at their own risk and at the risk of the theatrical managers, may entirely ignore him. An author or manager may submit a play to the censor for approval or may have it produced without submission. This peculiar compromise indicates that the perplexed parliamentarians followed the line of least resistance. They did not want to abolish the censor out of hand and they did not want him to retain his absolute authority, so they took a course which will lead quite naturally to the result desired by the playwrights of London. The censor will be more and more ignored as time goes on and in the end his office will be swept away as a ridiculous sinecure. But the compromise does not mean that the stage in England is to have unbridled license. The production of plays is to be watched over by the public prosecutor. If this official thinks that any unlicensed play which has been actually performed is objectionable on the score of indecency, he will have the manager and the author indicted, with the result that they may be punished by a court of law and the license of the theater "endorsed." Three such "endorsements" are to render a license subject to forfeiture. If the play contains offensive personalities, or hurts the character of a living personage or ridicules religion or wounds the susceptibilities of a friendly power, the attorney-general may bring it before a committee of the Privy Council which, after a secret hearing, may prohibit the performance for ten years. The "endorsement" plan gives the authorities the whip hand over the theaters, of course, but it is not likely to be more terrifying to managers than the provisions of the penal code which are so seldom invoked against stage presentations in this country.

Who Will Be Chief of Staff?

Interest just now center in the discussion of the chances of the different generals who are eligible to succeed General Bell as chief of staff. This important position will not become vacant until April but already there are many candidates. Nearly all the major-generals, I am told, have their lightning rods up—Wood, Grant, Barry, Carter especially. Brigadier-General Bliss is another aspirant; so is General Wotherspoon, now assistant chief of staff, General Murray, chief of Coast Artillery, and Brigadier-General Crozier, the ordnance chief who is looked upon as one of the greatest geniuses in the service. If gossip is to be credited, there are two men who are the likeliest candidates for the tempting position—Generals Wood and Barry. As Secretary of War, the President manifested the greatest regard for Leonard Wood and there is no doubt that this much-discussed soldier is a man of rare ability. His medical knowledge would stand him in good stead, for the chief of staff has to pass on medical questions, and nobody denies that he is a brave and able field officer. As to his administrative talents there has been a divergence of opinion ever since the Cuban days. But he is a hard worker, up early and late, and is of the athletic type which is too rare in the army. His ambition is unbounded and he will leave no stone unturned to attain his ends. But General Barry is much better liked in the army and it is certain that if he were chosen, the appointment would be widely popular. His admirable handling of the last army of occupation in Cuba won him praise and recognition on every side. Some disinterested army men say that the appointment either of Barry or Crozier would be much better for the service than that of Wood.

Melba Goes In For Racing

Madame Nellie Melba, the great lyric soprano, has lately developed a love for horse racing, according to some of her local friends who keep track of her doings in the Antipodes. I do not know whether it is from pure love of the sport of kings or from the hope of financial gain that the diva has begun to manifest this interest. I have heard that her circumstances are rather straitened, but this may be unfounded gossip. At any rate, Madame Melba has registered her racing colors in Melbourne—olive green, mauve sash and white cap. Mrs. Langtry did not wait until so late in life before indulging her passion for horse racing; she began at the tender age of eleven. She and a sporting brother of immature years owned a racehorse named Flirt. Many artifices had to be used to conceal the real character of Flirt who cost the partners about $25, from their father, and they used to smuggle her out under all sorts of pretences for trial spins on the common. But their sporting confidence was well rewarded when Flirt not only won the first race she ran in, but a $150 prize into the bargain. With this auspicious success Mrs. Langtry's connection with racing may be said to have commenced.

Women Who Smoke Cigars

During the hearing of a rather notorious case in London recently it came out that the member of a very well known ladies' club was addicted to cigar smoking. This unusual discovery has started an investigation of the subject with the result that it has been ascertained that many of the feminine devotees of nicotine in London no longer rest content with the dainty cigarette but prefer to soothe their nerves with the "big weed." This seems to set aside the popular notion that women are constitutionally unfit for such a habit. One of the London dealers who was induced to speak on this delicate subject is reported as saying: "I believe that the example of the member of the ladies' club is being followed to a certain extent in society, although it is difficult to obtain definite information on the point because, while ladies do not mind smoking cigarettes in public, cigar smoking would attract too much attention to be pleasant. Consequently they do it in private. I am led to believe that this is so by the increased demand for mild cigars. Ladies order them, presumably for male friends and relatives; but the type of cigar they order is not popular enough amongst the men to warrant the unusual demand. Then, again, I know of three ladies who order the same brand of mild cigar, and as they are acquainted with one another there is not much doubt that they have recommended these cigars to one another for their own smoking."

The Divine Sarah as Joan of Arc

Paris finds its latest nine days' wonder in the spectacle of Sarah Bernhardt playing the Maid of Orleans in a new drama by Emile Moreau who collaborated with Sardou on "Mme. Sans Gene." Moreau has not allowed historical accuracy to hamper him in his portrayal of Joan for he represents her as a devotee devoid of those remarkable traits which won her recently the honor of beatification. His disregard of history is as thorough as that shown by Anatole France in his recent dishonest biography and is no doubt a bid for the approval of the bigoted anticlericals who dominate French politics. The sensation of the play comes in the last act, which shows the smoke ascending from the stake at which the Maid is being burned alive. The smoke curls through the window of a chateau, carrying with it the realistic odor of buring flesh and plunging the Duke of Bedford into profound remorse. From all accounts, that smoke with its gruesome odor overshadows the personality of the divine Sarah in the discussion of the play along the boulevards and in the newspapers.

An Amazing Irish Play

Great indignation has been aroused among the Irish of London by the first presentation of "The Tinker's Wedding," by the late J. M. Sygne, which has just been given in the Afternoon Theatre. Even reviewers unsympathetic with Ireland regard it as a very crude study of the lower depths of Irish life. The personages are traveling tinkers. Sarah Casey, a buxom young woman, wishes Michael Byrne to marry her. He is willing, but regards the marriage ceremony as a waste of money and time. Sarah finds a priest, who, after much barganing, agrees to marry them for half a sovereign and a gallon tin jar. Byrne's drunken old mother, a simple pagan, who has never heard a prayer uttered by a priest, steals the jar and exchanges it for porter. The priest arrives for the wedding, demands his fee, and receives the half-sovereign and a parcel supposed to contain the jar, but holding only straw and two empty bottles. He thereupon refuses to marry them. Sarah then tries to attack the old woman with a bottle; the priest interferes, and threatens to denounce them all to the police as thieves and poachers. Upon this they knock him down, gag him, tie him up in a sack, and prepare to bolt. As a merciful afterthought, they set him free on his oath not to denounce them, and as they depart the curtain falls upon the priest invoking all manner of curses on their heads.

"The Tocsin," an Ambitious Drama

Paul Elder, the local publisher, has just brought out a limited edition of a very ambitious dramatic attempt. This is "The Tocsin," a play of the Italian renaissance, the work of Esther Brown Tiffany, who is described as a member of a literary family of Boston. The book is in the best style of Elder's craftmanship and the play, while far from being a dramatic masterpiece, is undeniably interesting. The theme is a big one, being the dépiction of the influence of a saintly nun upon the corrupt society of Florence during the plague which raged in that city in 1586. Sister Maddalena, a "Poor Claire," had been converted several years before by a remarkable sermon preached by a young priest and had vowed herself to a life of poverty and charity. Naturally she never forgot the instrument of her introduction into the spiritual life which completely satisfied the yearning of her soul, and the young priest was shrined in her heart as a saint of God. It is her one earthly aspiration to meet him once again, to fall at his feet and to bathe them with tears of thanksgiving. This, of course, is a highly sentimental desire and those who think they understand the spirit of medieval sainthood may question whether Sister Maddalena would have cherished any such aspiration. But the idea lends itself to dramatic treatment and if it be accepted as logical, one can not but admire the manner in which Miss Tiffany developes her plot. For the young priest who converted her has become a pleasure-loving abbot who does not scruple to run away from Florence with all his monks when the plague invades the city. As the priest had won the woman to God, the woman now wins back the abbot to his religious vows, besides profoundly influencing the lives of the courtesan Bianca, the favorite of the reigning de Medici, and other characters.

Miss Tiffany's Heroine

It would be unfair to compare Miss Tiffany's dramatic experiment with the work of a master like the late Catulle Mendes, but there is a great similarity in outline between her Sister Maddelena and his Saint Teresa, a part which Sarah Bernhardt played. In both plays it has been necessary for the authors to indicate, within the narrow confines of an acting drama, the wonderful influence which a saintly personality exerts upon all those over whom it is cast. Mendes did this with a master's hand; Miss Tiffany as well as could be expected of a beginner. Her method may be slightly indicated by quoting the language which Sister Maddelena uses when she discovers that the sainted priest of her dreams has fallen from grace: "Crushed, broken, desolate! Oh, these woman's tears! when I should have the tongue of men and of angels! Lord, not this cup, not this! If ever Thy handmaiden hath found favor in Thy sight, my life for his, my soul, my salvation! Lord, forget not it was he who led me to Thee. O star of my life, dim, fallen! (To the abbot). Count it for you, too, sleep, not death that has lain upon you, sleep, since that hour when your real self woke and spoke. What you were in that moment, be again. Not too late! O Lord, quicken Thou my feeble woman's force. Through the bitterness of these tears the power goes from me. No time now for despair! Your city; your people!" This is no doubt dramatic, touching; but its verity is open to doubt. No saint ever offered to barter his or her salvation to save a sinner. The great Teresa trembled on her deathbed because she had prayed all her life for others and had forgotten herself, a quite different situation. It weakens the force, too, to know that the abbot had preached that touching sermon under the influence of wine. So this play, while frankly religious, must not be judged by religious standards or its appeal is hopelessly impaired.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy.

Stocks—The chief influence in the security market during the recent week has been the awaiting by banking interests for a line on the President's message to Congress. Securities found substantial support in the earlier days of the week on the throwing out of the budget by the House of Lords and the starting of the switchmen's strike on the Northwestern railway systems and this support was undoubtedly influenced by the early knowledge of important bankers here of the position that Mr. Taft would take toward corporations. Hence the strength of the market may be well accounted for in the closing prices. The outlook for a better range of values seems quite bright with labor troubles somewhat subsided and money likely to work easier in the coming few days.

Wheat—Interjection of the switchmen's strike has maintained the price of wheat which was showing some heaviness on the increase in the visible and a promise of liberal receipts of spring wheat. While the strike remains unsettled the market will develop strength; there will probably be a heavy selling the moment the strike is declared off, and in the reaction a good purchasing opportunity will be presented, as it will take some days to restore normal conditions and priority of shipments will be given to perishable goods and fuel. There should be a decline in the visible Monday and if the strike is continued a good bulge will develop. The wheat supplies are far below last year and the present acreage has been largely increased and promises to be the largest since 1902. The condition of the growing plant is as excellent as in that year. Yet with the 34,000,000 acres of 1904 and its high December condition the crop was only 402,000,000. It is too early to take more than passing interest in next year's crop and it will not begin to have an influence before March next. European prices hold firm and Russia will drop back in shipments so we are likely to have demand for our wheat by Europe during the coming sixty days as Argentine shipments will not be available in Europe before the middle of February.

Corn has weakened in the past week two cents in December and a cent in May. The Chicago receipts have been large this week but contract corn has been only two per cent of the arrivals. There were large receipts of old corn last month, some of which has been used in mixing with new corn to get a contract grade. There have been small deliveries as anticipated but the break developed before the deliveries. There has been a good demand for new corn, even for low grades for immediate use. The weather has not improved and complaints of car shortage are being made by country dealers who have sold for December delivery. December is purely a weather market and there is still time for a change to put corn in contract shape for this month's delivery. May is well supported and some of the December shorts have been slipping into the long side of this option.

Cotton—The Cotton market has suffered from the usual November dullness, but with the advent of December we expect a general increase in activity in business both in spots and futures. This is evidenced by private reports and estimates that are coming to the front in anticipation of the government annual crop estimate to be made public about December 10. Notable among the figures given out is the estimate of Mr. Joseph Newburger of 10,200,000 bales maximum. This is attracting attention from the fact that his last year's figures were 13,900,000 bales. Among other estimates of importance were 10,500,000 bales by the Commercial Appeal of Memphis, 10,350,000 by Clement Curtis & Co. of Chicago, and 10,436,000 by Miss Giles of New York. Other estimates will soon be forthcoming and since these may reasonably be assumed to foreshadow the Government, the market in the late days of the week became much firmer. Liverpool was stimulated to retrieve some of the decline, although the estimates of her traders averaged a million bales too high. The low figures have set the trade to thinking, have called attention to the possibilities of the situation and to what had been forgotten, namely, that the condition of the crop declined steadily from its planting in May to its maturity in September, and to the further fact that the acreage was officially reported nearly five per cent under that of last year. A receptive state of mind is being created for other low crop estimates for a very small Census ginning report up to December and for a small return by the Department of Agriculture on December 10. When once the idea that this latter is to be around 10,000,000 is well under way, the probabilities favor an advance of from 150 to 200 points. We are extremely bullish and favor buying on all declines.

Copper—The market for copper shares has been rather irregular for the past week or so due mainly to generally weaker stock market conditions and to the public's fears that the contemplated copper merger will not go through. While the general copper list has had some decline, the reaction has been nowhere near the proportions of the recent advance and it is almost certain that outside of the usual percentage of profit-taking, the balance of the selling has been for weak-kneed bull account. Copper metal has shown but little change, a rather firm tone prevailing in this department. In order to set aside the fears of those who interpret the copper merger as a menace to trade and a restrainer of business, it is learned on unquestionable authority that this combination of copper companies will comply in every way with the Sherman Act and that it is the main object of the merger to promote the uses and sale of copper metal throughout the world. To all appearances the objects of the United States Steel corporation and those of the new Copper Merger will be alike. It seems reasonable to suppose that with this copper deal practically assured, the shares of the interested and other companies will soon start a movement for higher levels and for that reason purchases of the standard copper shares at their present prices are said to be advisable. Local Securities—The past week has seen some of the liveliest local stock and bond dealings in the history of the Exchange. Spring Valley Water stock has been the card and it has shown a startling advance of almost fifteen points. The matter of the purchase of the Water Company's plant by the City of San Francisco has now gone as far as it can and only awaits the public's "yes" or "no" at the special election to be held on January 14. In the meantime the stock will be influenced by rumors and reports concerning the probable attitude of the people at the election. Associated Oil has also been very active and has advanced to high records, on this move, following in the wake of rumors of early dividends and of the listing of the stock on the New York Stock Exchange. Power stocks continue to show a very firm undertone with the chief inquiry for City Electric and Northern California Power. Hawaiian Sugar stocks have been rather dull with few important changes. Alaska Packers has had an irregular trend and seems to lack ginger although at the present writing it is said that there are several large buying orders to be turned loose soon. Pacific Telephone stocks and Pacific Gas & Electric stocks are rather quiet and slightly weaker, if anything, though there has been nothing given out that would have a weakening effect on them. Bond transactions have been of large caliber but the heaviest trading has been in about six issues. The bonds that are showing the largest call are Oakland Transit Con. 5s, Pacific Electric Railway 5s, Peoples Water 5s, Pacific Telephone 5s, Spring Valley Water 4s and United Railroads 4s. Information on Associated Oil is just as bullish as ever and its purchase is said to be still advisable. From reliable sources comes the tip that Alaska Packers will surely cross 90 before the annual meeting which takes place toward the end of January. Concerning Spring Valley, everything lies with the coming election. Those known to be on the inside say that the plant will be purchased for $35,000,000,000. If so, allowing for $17,859,000 of bonds and 280,000 shares of stock outstanding, the stock figures on paper to be worth about $61 per share. If the city takes over the plant, one of two things must happen to the bonds. They must either be guaranteed by the city, principal and interest, which would make them worth par and interest or the city must issue their regular 4½s instead, the latter being worth around 105. Conservative traders are selling the stock and buying the bonds figuring that the element of speculation is greatly reduced and the prifits reasonably large.

"Scat" at the Francisca

The card room at the new Francisca Club is becoming a popular rendezvous for the members and their friends, and although no stakes are allowed, much bridge is played. Mrs. William Prentiss Morgan who is considered the cleverest bridge player in the club, was among the first to introduce the game into local society. Recently Mrs. Morgan has put the stamp of her approval on "scat," the rather complicated German game which is entirely too intricate to become widely popular. "Scat" however, has its earnest devotees and among them is a coterie which meets weekly for a game at the Francisca Club. It includes Mrs. Morgan, Mrs. William Hopkins, Mrs. Ida Pierce, Mrs. Le Roy Nickel, Mrs. William R. Smedberg, Mrs. Cyrus Walker and Mrs. M. P. Jones.

High Stakes at Bridge Parties

The younger married set in society has taken up "auction bridge," which has greater possibilities in the matter of stakes than ordinary bridge. That is, I am told, larger sums may be won or lost, an advantage which will be readily appreciated as lending zest to an evening's pastime. Ten cents a point at bridge was considered a heavy game in the old days, a season or two ago. Now the exchange of several hundred dollars in an evening is far from unusual. At such a rate do we progress. Formerly, also, prizes were the chief attractions of afternoon bridge parties. Now it is the stakes. For, while French mirrors and silk hosiery may be awarded at the end of an afternoon, they are merely details arranged by the hostess like the salad and ices. It is the stakes, made by the players at each table, which are of paramount interest. Naturally money does not change hands in the presence of sixty other guests or so, some of whom may still play for prizes only, but the following day checks are sent and debts liquidated. All of this has made the matter of arranging guests one that requires tact and diplomacy on the part of the hostess. It would be fatal to place a plain "prize player" with old fashioned prejudices at the same table with one who must play for stakes or be bored.

Men at the Tea Table

A Californian just back after six years abroad remarked to me recently that the most pronounced change in society was the growing popularity of afternoon tea. It is no longer considered necessary for a man to apologize for drinking tea in the afternoon with his women friends. Quite the contrary. Society regards it as very bad form for a person to ask for anything stronger and only those who do not understand the little ways of the social world consider the tea room as equivalent to the bar. Of course it isn't exactly necessary for a man to be quite as fastidious as Louis Bruguiere, for instance, who often officiates at a tea table at the St. Francis. No bride, showing off for the first time before her friends, is more particular than the debonair Louis who insists on making the tea himself. The afternoon tea room gatherings at the St. Francis and other hotels are growing to be regular institutions. Footlight stars, society belles, visitors, idlers and shoppers make an interesting picture.

The Smallest Feet in Paris

Little Gertrude Fleming who arrived in New York this week from Paris where she had been studying under De Rezske, has been the talk of the French newspapers for the past month, having been discovered as a Cinderella in a competition in which pretty nearly every Parisienne, celebrities of the stage and the opera, society elegantes and professional beauties, participated. As a result of having won, Miss Fleming was privileged to take a two week's trip to London, remaining for the time at the Carleton, every item of expense being paid by the daily papers that were carrying on this competition in dainty feet. That a Californian should win first prize for having the smallest feet in Paris chagrined the Parisian women bitterly, but what were they to do? Paris women have always arrogated to themselves the distinction of having the smallest of feet, and so positive were they that no one ever disputed the claim. Miss Fleming had no idea of entering such a competition until some of her friends urged her to try. The prize was to be awarded not only for the size, but shapeliness as well, and when the award was made no one was more surprised than the demure little San Francisco singer herself. She and her mother made the trip to London just before coming to this side. To answer the curiosity of those interested in the standard as set in Paris by Miss Fleming, the Paris papers aver that Miss Fleming wears a No. I, AA last, but that it was more for their symmetrical shape than for their size that Miss Fleming's feet were given the prize.

Tantalus Was Correct

The approaching marriage of our charming Queen Vergilia to Carlo Baron will not surprise readers of these columns, for it was foretold by yours truly as long ago as September 4. I told at that time of this young Italian artist's sincere admiration for the regal mistress of our Portola celebration and indicated that she would look with favor upon his suit. Young Baron decorated the interior of the City of Paris and painted the portraits of several prominent society women while he was here. His sudden departure from town was regarded by many as proof that the course of his true love ran without the traditional smoothness, but those who were in Miss Bogue's confidence were always pretty sure that she would in due time reward his patient devotion.

Miss Walker's Latest Admirer

The many friends of attractive Genevieve Walker, grand-daughter of Mrs. Eleanor Martin, are noting with much interest the deep devotion and marked attentions which the young lady is receiving from young Richard Burke. This young man is the son of Richard Burke, the Irish barrister, who married Miss Donohue, daughter of James Donohue and cousin of Baroness Von Schroeder. Mrs. Burke died in Ireland many years ago, leaving a large fortune to her husband and children. Mr. Burke's interests bring him to this city at intervals and he is always received with a cordial welcome for he has as many friends here as he has in Dublin and at his Irish country seat. Just how serious the infatuation of young Burke for Miss Walker may be I do not profess to know. This charming girl has had many suitors but heretofore she has not turned her thoughts seriously to the question of marriage. If she reciprocates the ardent feelings of young Burke, that chap is indeed to be felicitated.

This charming matron is the patroness of several worthy charities and is helping to gladden many hearts during the holiday season.

The Owls of Bohemia

The new Bohemian Club is to have an Owl Room, but I am assured that the Family Club's Stork Room did not suggest the idea to the "committee on interior decorating." On the contrary. As long ago as 1902, an Owl Room was added to the attractions of the Bohemian Club, which makes it apparent that whatever suggestion is indicated in the bird frieze idea must have been drawn from the older frieze. The Owls decorated a small apartment in the old club. Charles Dickman, who was responsible for them, had, quite by accident, painted in the expressions and characteristic poses of several of the members. The most striking likeness was that of Charles Josselyn, whose dignity and poise were perfectly represented in a solemn brown creature of the frieze. Dickman is, I believe, to assist in disposing "the birds of Bohemia" about the new Owl Room which is to be an imposing apartment suitable for large banquets. There will also be a reproduction of the famous "Red Room" in the new club, and this, too, is to be on a larger scale than the old. The same motto, "Weaving Spiders come not here," will be inscribed above the door, and as far as possible the traditions of the old Red Room will be preserved.

Miss Edith Hoefler Wedded

One of the most interesting marriages of the week was that of Miss Edith Hoefler and Charles Albert Vance which was solemnized on Thursday evening at Trinity Episcopal Church, Bishop William F. Nichols and Rev. Frederick W. Clampett officiating. The maid of honor was Miss Nellie Vance and the bridesmaids, the misses Adeline Bogart, Marguerite Dell, Georgine Hanson, Clementine King, Dorothy Mann and Frances Pierce. and Howard Hoenes. Miss Elise Young acted as organist for the occasion. The ushers were Edwin Abbott, Blue Allen, Frank Bray, Clifford Jones, David Martin and Raphael Polk. Charles H. Holbrook Jr. was best man. Following the church ceremony there was a reception at the Fairmont to which 500 friends had been bidden. The bride is the daughter of Ludwig M. Hoefler, the well known attorney and is distinguished by a magnetic personality and a serious ambition for literary and musical honors. Mr. Vance belongs to a Stockton family but has resided in this city for many years. Many entertainments have been given in honor of the young bride and groom. Among them was a dinner given to the bridal party in the breakfast room of the Bohemian Club by Archibald Barnard and another elaborate dinner given by Mrs. Gustave H. Umbsen at her residence, Broderick street and Broadway.

George Crocker's Romance

The death of George Crocker recalls the romance of his marriage which, when it took place ten years ago, caused a sensation in society. The match had been sternly opposed by the young millionaire's family who believed the difference in the ages of the couple would lead to unhappiness. Mrs. Crocker, although a handsome, vivacious woman, was fifteen years her husband's senior. She also, it was said, refused several times to marry young Crocker. But in the end she did and the union was an ideally happy one. Mrs. Crocker, who was Emma Hanchette Rutherford, had three children who have always been devoted to their step-father. Alexander Rutherford, the only son, is in business in New York. Alice, the older daughter, married J. Langdon Erwing of New York, and Emma, who was known as "Birdie" Rutherford, is the wife of Philip Kearney, grand-son of the famous general. Her home is in Morristown, New Jersey. Mrs. Kearney was in San Francisco a few weeks ago to attend the wedding of her uncle, Lewis Hanchette, and Miss Corbett.

Matrons Study Fancy Dancing

Those who imagine that the study of fancy dancing is confined to youngsters at dancing school are mightily mistaken. Some of our most prominent young matrons are just now enjoying their initiation into the mysteries of this art and from all that I have heard, are taking their lessons with a seriousness of purpose and of effort unusual in such pursuits. The matrons I refer to live in San Rafael and Ross Valley and they have formed a class which assembles at regular intervals to go through the most complicated steps under the direction of a very skilful dancing master. Among those who are exhibiting the greatest proficiency are Mrs. Edward T. Schmiedell, Mrs. Seward McNear, Mrs. Pence, Mrs. Horne and Mrs. Harrison Dibblee.

Zelaya Delays a Wedding

The crisis in Nicaragua has affected the plans of Ensign George Joerns, who was to have been married in January to Miss Constance Cummins of this city. Ensign Joerns is attached to the gun boat Yorktown, which has been ordered to the scene of the unpleasantness and which sailed from Magdalena Bay last week for Corinto. So instead of taking a bride, as he had planned, the young officer will spend the day set for his marriage assisting in the correction of Zelaya. The postponed wedding will take place on the return of the Yorktown from Nicaragua, which is a matter that rests with the War Department. Ensign Joerns is a Philadelphian who graduated from Annapolis in the Class of 1907. His fiancee is a sister of Earl Cummins, the sculptor, and is a strikingly pretty girl. Her sister, Mrs. Harry Childs of Spokane, a bride of last summer, will be matron of honor when the delayed wedding takes place.

To Help a Blind Widow

One of the worthiest charitable entertainments of the holiday season is that which is planned for the benefit of Mrs. Ida Graham, a blind widow with nine young children depending on her. Mrs. Graham was stricken after the death of her husband and is unable to care for her family, the youngest of whom is two years old while the eldest is eighteen. Sympathetic friends have arranged a musicale for her assistance and it will be given next Thursday evening, December 16, at the St. Francis Hotel. Those who will contribute to the entertainment are artists of unusual ability and the character of the affair is further vouched for by the distinguished names which appear in the list of patronesses. The artists who will assist are Mackenzie Gordon, the tenor; Louis Albert Larsen, the baritone; Miss Georgiana Strauss, the contralto who was here with the International Opera Company last season; Frederic Maurer, the pianist; Miss Eula Howard, the pianiste; Herman Heller, the violinist; Miss Kaethe Pieczonka, the 'cellist; and Mrs. Squire Varick Mooney and Mrs. Louise L. Gage, elocutionists. Tickets are for sale at the St. Francis newsstand and at the Eilers Music Company.

Another American May Be Vicereine

Friends of Miss Jennie Crocker in this city are beginning to take an excited interest in English politics. Not that they bother their dainty heads about the budget or Lord Landsdowne's speeches or any of those tiresome sorts of things, but they are interested in Miss Crocker's friends around the British throne and there is quite a possibility that one of those friends may be the next vicereine of Ireland. I refer to Lady Granard, who was Beatrice Mills before her alliance with Lord Granard transported her to the innermost circle of English exclusiveness. If the Liberal party is returned to power at the next general election, Lord Granard will in all probability succeed

Lord Aberdeen as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. It would be necessary, of course, to put through Parliament a special act making a Roman Catholic eligible for this viceregal post, for only a Protestant can occupy the position at present, and Lord Granard belongs to the older faith. But that would be easy under another Liberal administration. Lady Granard would be the second American to hold the position of vicereine, Lady Curzon having been the first when her husband was Viceroy of India. If Lady Granard goes to Dublin Castle the king will favor Ireland with his presence more frequently for he is fond of the Granards and likes the atmosphere of the Pale when somebody besides the parsimonious Aberdeen is administering affairs there. Do you wonder that Miss Crocker's friends are delving into English politics? A season in Dublin has attractions which are not even to be found in London, for there is a deal of brilliancy in the old capital and a refreshing absence of stiff conventionality. Miss Crocker is in a fair way to find this out for herself.

Miss Kemble's Piano Studies

A series of interpretative studies in modern opera will be given in the opening months of the new year at the St. Francis by Miss Margaret Kemble who is justly admired for illustrative piano playing. On the afternoon of January 10 Miss Kemble will interpret Richard Strauss' Elektra; on February 7 she will give Paul Dukas' Ariane et Barbe Bleu; on March 7 Strauss' Salome, and on April 4 Frederick Converse's The Pipe of Desire. Although these works stand in the forefront of modern musical composition, they are far from well known in this city and there is no doubt that music lovers will avail themselves of the opportunity to hear Miss Kemble's interpretations. The subscription list will be limited and the tickets issued in the order in which the fee of $5 for the season is received. Subscriptions may be sent to Miss Kemble at the St. Francis or to 1613 Bonita avenue, Berkeley.

Golf at Del Monte

Interest in the New Year's golf tournament at Hotel Del Monte is increasing every day. Since the first announcement of the tournament, the management of the hotel has received many inquiries as to how the play would be held. The following is the official announcement: There will be a handicap competition for men and a similar event for women; qualifying rounds over eighteen holes, medal play, will he held on Friday morning, beginning at 9:30, eight to qualify in each event. The first match rounds will be played on Friday afternoon; the semi-final match rounds on Saturday morning and the final match rounds on Saturday afternoon, all rounds being over eighteen holes. Trophies will be offered for competition among those who fail to qualify.

New Year's Party at Pebble Beach Lodge

The golfers may have things all their own way during the day time, but those who enjoy a social dance, a merry song and jolly freedom before a roaring fire will have their inning on Saturday evening when an old fashioned New Year's party will be held at Pebble Beach Lodge. Mr. Warner has arranged for the rapid transportation of his guests from the hotel to the lodge and has planned an interesting entertainment for them. The great hall of the lodge is of such size that there will be room for all and there will be lots of popcorn, apples, applejack and cider served during the evening. Those who have already decided to go are busy making up their parties and the old year will be bidden goodby and the new one welcomed with a great deal of hilarity.

The Maclean Musicale

On Sunday evening the beautiful studio of Mr. Donald Maclean, 113 Green street, was the scene of a brilliant musicale, the guest of the evening being Miss Mary Adele Case, whom Mr. Maclean knew in Paris. Miss Case sang a group of songs and her voice and manner were as charming as her appearance. Mr. Maclean himself gave a most artistic rendering of a number of French, German and English songs, singing with great dramatic intensity and grace of expression.

"The Gay Musician" Not So Gay

By Edward F. O'Day

There are prophets among us who insist that musical comedy will soon cease to be. Unlike the prophets of old who never explained their forecasts and were stoned for their pains, these modern soothsayers condescend to argue the matter, proving their assertion with many ingenious and plausible reasons. I do not pretend to know whether they speak truth or otherwise, but I am free to confess that their doleful predictions have frequently filled me with sorrow. I do not care to see musical comedy pass away. Comic opera is very well in its place, but I see no reason why musical comedy should make place for it, as these melancholy prophets insist it must. There is plenty of room in this sad old world for both comic opera and musical comedy. That at least is the way I usually feel about it; but being an inconstant soul at best, fickle, if you please, I admit that there are times when I am willing to join with those who challenge musical comedy's right to continued existence. I have just passed through one of these unpleasant periods, a sort of blue funk during which, if I had been asked to assign any reason why sentence of death should not be passed on musical comedy, I would have thrown up my hands in despair and acknowledged that it was guilty and could adduce no extenuating circumstances in mitigation of the capital penalty. This pessimistic fit came upon me at the Valencia theater during the two hours or so which were consumed by the first presentation of "The Gay Musician." Now "The Gay Musician" should not inspire such a state of mind for the music is by Julian Edwards. The name of Julian Edwards has never before suggested to me gloomy thoughts of the moribund condition of musical comedy; it has always stood for tunefulness, for airy gaiety, for the joyous abandon which makes musical comedy at its best a thing to conjure away the imps of woe and to summon the sprites of pleasure. But there was something amiss when Julian Edwards tackled the book of "The Gay Musician." What was wrong with the book is no secret, but just what was wrong with Julian Edwards must remain a mystery until the composer himself comes forward to inform us why he consented to use the book at all. Good books must have been awfully scarce when Julian Edwards consented to write the music for "The Gay Musician;" and when good books for comic opera are so scarce that Julian Edwards has to compose for a poor one, there is some sense in saying that musical comedy will soon cease to be. For the book of "The Gay Musician" is not what I would confidently call a good book. A good book for a musical comedy should be clever, it should be ingenious, it should have lines that move laughter easily, its characters should be interesting and more or less original. These, in my opinion, are some of the virtues of a good musical comedy book; but if I am mistaken, if these are not the virtues necessary, then the book of "The Gay Musician" may be a good book. I notice that some of the dramatic critics have given the book their unqualified approval, so perhaps I am entirely in error on this point. Few indeed are those who are empowered to speak with authority when their subject is dispraise. One of the critics paid glowing tribute to the "refinement" of the lines of "The Gay Musician." I remember one line which may or may not bear him out. It comes when the ambitious young composer who is the gay musician of the piece tries to tell his prospective father-in-law a little family history. The father-in-law prospective is in no mood for the disclosure. "We'll chew the rag later—the whole family wash," he interposes. I am not an expert authority on fathers-in-law, so I can not testify as to the propriety of this sentiment when uttered by one of the speciees. It may be that fathers-in-law are addicted to this forthrightness of metaphor; at some time in the remote future I may be able to speak with assurance on this subject. But I confess to some little acquaintance with the books of musical comedies, produced and unproduced, and I have never seen that sort of language in any which I would praise for their "refinement." Far would it be from me to single out this father-in-law utterance if it stood alone in "The Gay Musician," but there are lines a-plenty boasting the same choice pungency of phrase. And there is "business" in the piece (to use a technical term), in which the family wash is thrust upon the attention of the audience. One may not ignore that family wash, no matter how willing one may be to observe this rudimentary regulation of politeness. It is literally flung out of the window and must be gazed at. I was puzzled for a long time about Miss Texas Guinan who is the leading spirit of "The Gay Musician" company. All the blackface type is for Miss Texas Guinan; likewise the center of the stage and most of the limelight. I was puzzled to account for her. She is not particularly attractive; some of the chorus girls are raving beauties by comparison. She is not a particularly graceful dancer; again some of the choristers make comparison rather odious. That she can not act is no great dispargement, I suppose, in these moribund (if moribund they are) days of musical comedy. But to say that she can not sing is to state an unvarnished truth with charitable softness, to strike a harsh note with the soft pedal on. So I was greatly puzzled to account for Miss Guinan until I remembered reading somewhere that she was the niece of Senator Bailey of Texas. That, of course, is the answer; but has it ever been included in the long catalogue of sins which the muckrakers have piled up to the discredit of the naughty United States senators that their postion or their wealth may make leading ladies out of their nieces? It is the severest indictment of our legislative body which I have thought upon since Colonel Roosevelt took the big stick to Nairobi. I do not know whether Harry Benham who plays the gay musician has an uncle in the United States Senate or not. If he has not at least a grandfather in the

MISS NIETA QUINN

The clever young comedienne of the Donald Bowles Company who will appear next week at the Orpheum.

House of Representatives he must remain an enigma. But let us not go through the cast with "Who's Who" in one hand and the Congressional Directory in the other. There are at least two players in it who need no relatives in the Federal government to enhance their importance. For all I care Roger Gray may not even have a second cousin in the pension bureau; he is a good natured fellow with loose joints and a comic style. If the librettist had not gone back to Joe Miller and first principles he would shine instead of merely glimmering. Lottie Kendall deserves more liberal commendation. Not only is she attractive in figure and form, but in her acting qualities as well. She has vivacity, grace, magnetism and a sweet voice which is so honest in its confession of vocal shortcomings that he would be a churl indeed who would find fault with it. I can not help mentioning in conclusion that I sympathize with Freda Klingel who played the soubrette. Miss Klingel is slim and graceful and dances well. Most of the audience thought so and demanded more, but Miss Klingel was not allowed to take her encore. While the audience continued to insist with warm applause, the stage was gradually filled for an ensemble number led by Miss Guinan. The audience was disappointed and I imagine that Miss Klingel felt badly about it, too. I do not blame her. In the United States Senate where Miss Guinan's uncle has a good speaking part, the "gray wolves" do that sort of thing to an insurgent when he scores with the gallery.

The New Playhouse in McAllister Street

This week sees the completion of another first-class theatre in the down-town section of San Francisco, marking another step in the re-establishment of the theatrical conditions as they existed before the fire. The Savoy Theatre, on McAllister street, a few steps from Market, will open its doors this Sunday night and the attraction will be John Cort's new production of the Pixley-Luders comedy opera, "King Dodo." The Savoy is under the direction of the Northwestern Theatrical Association of which John Cort is general manager. It was built for George A. Storey and the entire plant represents an investment of something like $250,000. Fred W. Busey, an experienced theatrical man, is the resident manager for Mr. Cort. The seating capacity of the theatre is about 1600 and there are twelve boxes which will accommodate six persons each. A portion of the orchestra space will be devoted to divans, each seating two persons. The stage is 40 by 75 feet and is splendidly equipped. The building is Class A in every particular and the exacting conditions imposed by the fire laws have been more than met. In "King Dodo" will be found many San Francisco favorites. The prima donna is Eleanor Kent, who, as Mabel Love, is well known here, as she was born and raised in this city. Zoe Barnett was long a favorite at the Princess. Laura Millard was popular at the Tivoli in its palmiest days and William H. West was also with the Tivoli.

Fritzi Scheff at the Van Ness

The incomparable Fritzi Scheff will be seen at the Van Ness for two weeks commencing next Monday in Charles Dillingham's production of "The Prima Donna," the new comic opera by Henry Blossom and Victor Herbert. She brings with her the original New York company which includes John E. Hazzard, Vernon Davidson, William K. Harcourt, Gilbert Clayton, Donald Hall, Martin Haydon, Phil Branson, Armand Cortes, Anna Pelham, Tillie Salinger, Grace Delmar, Maxine Verande, La Noveta, Katherine Stewart and many others. Miss Scheff is said to be a delight in the role of Mlle. Athenee, prima donna of the Opera Comique in Paris who disguises herself as a cafe singer in order to help a sick girl and becomes enamoured of a young soldier. Mr. Herbert's music is said by many to be the best he has written and some delightful songs are allotted to Mme. Scheff, enabling her to display her wonderful vocal powers.

Fritz Kreisler, Violinist

This Sunday afternoon at the Novelty Theatre, Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist and one of the most popular of the musical stars that visit us, will give his first program which will include Handel's Sonata in D major, Viotti's "Concerto" in A minor, some delightful old works by Pugnani, Couperin, Friedeman Bach and Boccherini, two gems by Mozart and Weber and two modern works by Dvorak and Wieniawski. On Thursday night he will play a program of works by Bach and the old masters Martini, Dittersdorf, Porpora, Francoeur, Tartini and Paganini and some modern works by Saint-Saens, Debussy and others, besides two of his own compositions. His farewell concert with a stunning program will be given Sunday afternoon, December 19. Seats are on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co's where complete programs are to be obtained. Next Friday afternoon, December 17, Kreisler will play in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse repeating the great program of Thursday night. For this event seats are on sale at Ye Liberty box office. Tuesday night, December 14, Kreisler plays an entirely different program before the St. Francis Musical Art Society.

Nance Olden at the Alcazar

Channing Pollock's dramatization of Miriam Michelson's story of a girl thief, "In the Bishop's Carriage," will be the Alcazar's next attraction, commencing Monday evening. Evelyn Vaughan will have the role of Nance Olden, the young criminal who is reformed by kindness; John Ince will be seen as Latimer, the attorney who converts her; Will R. Walling will again play the part of Tom Dorgan, the burglar from whose control the girl is saved, and all the other Alcazar favorites will have characters well suited to their talents. In the staging there will be augmented realism by the introduction of a genuine carriage and an up-to-date automobile.

Dr. Wullner's Farewell Concert

Dr. Ludwig Wullner has been induced to return for one day en route East from Los Angeles and give a farewell concert. So large is the repertoire of this artist that he has arranged another program of twenty-three songs with only one repetition from his former programs and that is Schubert's "Der Wanderer" for which he has received a dozen requests. The offerings will be a group of four Schubert songs, five Schumann works including "Ich Grolle Nicht," three Hugo Wolf numbers, two by Richard Strauss, a novelty by Arnold Mendelssohn and seven charming German folk-songs arranged by Brahms. Many of these works have never before been heard in this city. The concert will be given Monday night, December 13 at the Novelty Theatre and seats are now to be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co's.

The Orpheum Bill

Donald Bowles, an actor who is favorably remembered as one of the bright lights of the James Neill Company, will head the new bill at the Orpheum in the one act romantic drama "Guilty?" which was written for him by Victor H. Smalley, a St. Paul newspaperman. The Klein Family, seven in number, will be seen in a novel cycling act, full of humor and dexterity. For several years this troupe of cyclists has been touring Europe and for two years they were among the chief attractions at the Berlin Music Hall and the Circus Schuman. Harry Fox and the Millership Sisters will appear in a diverting assortment of song, dance and chatter which they call "Artistic Nonsense." Mr. Fox is a light comedian, while his handsome young colleagues are attractive foils for his comedy. Carl Nobel, "The Scandinavian Ventriloquist," will be a unique feature. Nobel's ideas are entirely new and he introduces several remarkable mechanical dummies. Next week will be the last of Florence Bindley, Stella H. Morrisini and the Four Floods. It will also conclude the engagement of that delightful comedienne Eva Taylor and her company who will say farewell in the picturesque fantasy "Dreamona."

Western Drama at Ye Liberty

Next week the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will have as their offering "The Judge and the Jury, a western play by Harry D. Cottrell and Oliver Morosco. Although the play will be entirely new to the playgoers across the bay it has earned quite a reputation by successes in other cities. When presented originally at the Burbank Theatre in Los Angeles it broke all records there for the number of consecutive performances, and afterwards enjoyed a successful season at Wallack's Theatre, New York, and has been played with the same success by nearly all of the stock companies throughout the country. The scenes of "The Judge and the Jury" are laid in New Mexico in the early nineties, and it tells an interesting story of the struggle for the hand of a girl between a rough miner and an effete mining promoter. A realistic mob scene and several picturesque stage settings are prominent features of "The Judge and the Jury," and these can be reproduced with striking realism on Ye Liberty's big revolving stage. The usual adequate cast will be presented.

The divorces have been about 16,400 annually in the United States for the past twenty years, but this is only one per cent of the number of marriages, and, therefore, there is nothing in the world that human beings undertake to do that can show so small a percentage of total failures as marriage.

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

Written exclusively for Town Talk by J. M. JACOBI

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

This Month's History Making Affair

The opening of the Palace Hotel under the management of Thomas Kirkpatrick brings back to San Franciscans one of the dearest associations of the past. Its reputation for comfort and hospitality in the days gone was known to all the travelers of the earth who had ever been in this city, and what more fitting occasion could there be to celebrate the rehabilitation of San Francisco than the succession of fetes and banquets to be enjoyed on the reopening of the famous landmark? There will be "a sound of revelry by night" and San Francisco will gather there her beauty and her chivalry. It is most important therefore that the harmony and elegance of the surroundings be preserved by conventional and correct attire in order that the proper dress simplicity of the men and the regal magnificence of the women may be heightened by contrast. To this end we venture some suggestions as to what is proper and elegant to wear and what is to be shunned as inappropriate.

EVENING DRESS SUIT

DRESS OR DINNER WAISTCOAT

Simplicity in Evening Dress

A gentleman no doubt looks his best in a dress-suit and when you consider the simple attire and how long a time it has been in vogue, it is most remarkable that Dame Fashion in all these years has never been able to deviate more from the first conception of a dress-suit than she really has. Except for the accessories and the more graceful designs of lapels on coat and waistcoat and the more slightly shaped trousers, a dress-suit is still the same as it was 50 years ago. There is one thing noticeable—the absence of all conspicuous jewelry and where, seventy years ago, men wore diamond studs with links to match, today they purchase a plain set of mother of pearls with cuff links to match. Ostentatious lockets of heavy gold chains attached to the watch have been replaced by a plain looking fob or the watch is fastened to a chain worn inside the waistcoat with a buttonhole through the pocket, making the chain invisible and pickpocket proof at the same time. This idea, by the way, is the invention of an attorney-at-law of this city who has been prevailed upon to apply for a patent.

The Full Dress Suit in Its Entirety

There is nothing more attractive nor handsomer than the color scheme of black and white which, notwithstanding the introduction of other colors like blue or plum, is still the only practical combination for the dress-suit. The illustration gives a clear idea of how a man should look if properly attired and for the benefit of those who like to go into details I will give a description. Beginning with the dress coat, the shoulders are natural and while a trifle concave, should be devoid of all excessive padding. The lapels are of a medium width, silk faced, but the collar is of cloth the same as the body of the coat. The coat must have a graceful contour and the roundness of the skirt at the hip should be accentuated by the close-fitting waist. There may be a breast pocket or not, but there should be a buttonhole or elastic fastening at the left lapel for a flower. Either a plain sleeve or blind cuffs are correct, but elaborate cuff finish or turned back cuffs are entirely out of the question. There should be two inner breast pockets, the pocket on the right side to be used for the kerchief.

The Evening Waistcoat

A late model of an evening waistcoat which is now being made by the most fashionable Fifth avenue tailors is shown in another cut. This waistcoat must always be white. The materials used are either silk, linen or pique, the front to be closed with three buttons. It may be noticed that it is almost U shape, the only difference being that at the bottom of the U it is almost square instead of round. The waistcoat may be even with the body of the dress-coat or protrude from one-half inch to one inch.

Trousers

The trousers may have braid at side or not, as fancy may direct the wearer. They are cut comfortably to allow the dancer or diner comfort and ease.

Shirts, Collars, Ties, Shoes and Hats

Shirts for full dress have three buttonholes for studs, and cuffs attached; materials to be either plain white line linen or pique. Of late a very small knife pleat has been worn, but as this is a very hard shirt to launder it is a rather unsatisfactory affair. The popular favorite in collars is still the poke, but a very smart dress collar is the midford, a very small round top English collar. Lawn ties or pique effects, to be tied by wearer. Shoes, button, patent leather or for dancing, pumps. The silk hat is still supreme as a dress hat but wherever there is a large gathering a crush hat is more advisable. Most any long overcoat can be worn, but the Protector or Inverness coats are real dress overcoats. Reefers knitted or padded.

"You look completely tired out, Baron."
"My wife has just given birth to twins."

and the past sinks into the shadows of twilight, perhaps there I shall tell her those things which would have always remained a secret but for her pitiless rebellion. This marriage, which Barbara brands as a deal between her father and myself, was on my part an act of pure love. I married her without a sou of dowry. She was, indeed, the daughter of Chartier, the rich banker, and her beauty and wealth caused her to be regarded as an exceptionally desirable parti.

At first I did not dare to hope that I could win her; she seemed beyond my reach. Her impending engagement to Monsieur de Boutteville, of the diplomatic service, was a matter of society gossip. But soon the gossips had a great deal to say concerning the shakiness of old Chartier's affairs, and Monsieur de Boutteville became a rare visitor at the banker's mansion. When the rumor became confirmed, Monsieur de Boutteville, under the pretext of an official trip abroad, withdrew from the field. Then I presented myself as a suitor for Barbara's hand. I had no rivals. The father frankly described to me his situation. We agreed to conceal the true state of affairs from the proud young woman, and I married her.

My wife did not come down this morning. I went up to her apartment, but she did not receive me. She buries herself in her anger with a certain voluptuous relish; she glories in it as if it were the odor of some exotic and poisonous flower; she becomes intoxicated with it. She will never forgive me.

She appears so distant that only the paths of death might lead us together again. We shall never come together in this world which is so hostile, which persists in separating us.

It is the world in which one enjoys himself, in which one amuses himself, that has made of Barbara the woman she has become. The world is the great enticer which has transformed her into one of its creatures. The lax principles which are its current coin have stained her spirit. Like others of her kind she is indulgent towards scandal; it amuses her, she admires the transgressions of love as if they occurred outside the domains of good and evil.

She is one with the spirit of this world which makes sport of marriage and glorifies the supreme law of passion, and I shudder when I think of the resolve which this misguided, vehement creature may take.

Barbara has become a child of the elegant anarchy of our modern society. In the brief span of our married life I have failed to imbue her with other principles, for her heart is not with me.

Like a somnambulist she has been walking towards the abyss; my rude hand has aroused her. What will come of it? Will a wholesome fear arrest her at the edge of the precipice?

I feel that she is planning some deed of madness there above my head. But I have no power over that irritated spirit. And yet I love her, in spite of all deficiencies of her nature. I feel that somewhere, in the depths of her heart, there slumbers a world of goodness.

I was rather late to luncheon, having been detained at the university. When I entered the dining-room I was surprised to find Barbara there. She seemingly expected me. The soup was just being served.

She replied to my salutation with a tremulous voice. But she did not raise her eyes to greet me, as if they were weighted down by an overwhelming sense of shame. I believed that she was repenting and I felt as if a great light had shed its radiance over me.

My wrath was transformed into an overpowering sense of pity and compassion. She seemed so deadly pale; the spoon trembled as she raised it to her lips.

"Are you suffering, Barbara?" I asked when I had sat down. She looked at me with a glance devoid of comprehension and suddenly rose to her feet. "Pardon me—I feel ill," she murmured. She left the room, calling for the maid.

I remained alone, lost in thought.

When my eyes turned to my plate I noticed with loathing that a gigantic spider was swinging to and fro right over the plate, suspended from the ceiling by an airy thread; it touched the soup with its pointed legs, and, startled, crawled up immediately with lightning celerity to its retreat on the ceiling. I have an almost superstitious horror and loathing of spiders, and pushed my plate away in disgust. I felt annoyed, for it was my favorite soup. As my wife seemed ill and apparently had no intention of returning to luncheon, I exchanged the plates and took hers.

Having finished my soup I rang for the maid: "Mary, ask madame if I shall wait for her with luncheon."

In the meanwhile I stepped into my study, in order to glance over my mail. One of the letters engaged my attention and I was startled when the maid entered and announced: "Madame is waiting for monsieur in the dining-room."

For a moment or two I lingered over the letter which referred to an interesting problem that was to be the subject of a forthcoming lecture.

When I returned to the dining-room the second course had been served. Barbara eyed me with a curiously anxious expression.

She shuddered when I addressed her, and her face bore the expression of a mute entreaty which seemed to me to augur well for our future.

As I was about to leave she seemed for a moment inclined to hold me back with a bashful gesture; suddenly I saw her grow pale and she clutched at her throat, as if she were choking. Frightened by her strange behavior, I exclaimed: "What is the matter with you?" but she recovered her composure and lightly observed: "Nothing, nothing," and bade me go.

I was called home from the lecture hall. It seemed to me as if the breath of some dire evil had chilled my brow. My heart beat violently. Had Barbara left me?

It was not disgrace, however, that awaited me at home. But I loved my wife and it seemed to me that I would have endured anything rather than the sight of the lovely creature, unconscious, stricken, the imprint of death on her anguished face.

Her features were distorted with an agony of pain. The ominous suspicion flashed through my brain that Barbara had voluntarily chosen death. The last traces of my wrath were dispelled like chaff in a whirlwind. I saw only the weak woman, entrusted to my protection, the innocent victim of my harshness, whom my distrust and endless harangues had driven to her death.

I questioned the maid. Had the doctor been sent for? Yes. Madame had been seized by a violent vomiting spell; the physician had failed to diagnose the case and was now investigating it. He had said something about cholera symptoms.

I bent low over her prostrate form. Where was that triumphant beauty which but a short while since so mightily fascinated me?

I touched her hand. It was cold and clammy. Low moans trembled continually on her lips. I spoke to her, but she did not hear me.

The physician entered the room and addressed me: "Professor, I will not conceal from you the fact that your wife is in a very grave condition. I have determined by means of a chemical analysis that this is a case of arsenical poisoning. Mme. Lasneret had some arsenic which I prescribed for her, but I cannot imagine how she could have taken so very large a dose. It seems almost incredible."

"I don't know what to think of it, doctor, but for heaven's sake give her an antidote!"

"I have done that, but unfortunately I was called very late. An ordinary antidote, an oxide of iron or precipitate of sulphur, will not be effective, for the poison has already inflamed the intestines. The poisoning must have occurred some hours ago, possibly at luncheon."

"At luncheon?" I whispered. "And you think—"

"Well, professor, I fear a fatal termination, but it may last a day or two."

I mumbled: "Try the impossible! Try to save her!"

"We shall leave nothing untried, but we are merely human and are powerless in the face of so destructive an agent."

I remained alone. I buried my head in the bed and my hands clutched convulsively. I cried to God for her recovery, I implored Him to spare me the inextinguishable sorrow for her ruin. Anything but that! The consciousness of my guilt crushed me into the dust. A hoarse cry escaped the pale lips of the suffering woman.

"Barbara!"

Was it the sound of my voice? She seemed to regain consciousness. Her eyes opened and she regarded me with the expression of a delirious sufferer.

"Barbara, my wife, why did you do this? Did you take this poison by mischance? Tell me that you did not wish to die."

"Die?" The expression of abject terror was mirrored in her features. "No, no! I did not take poison."

This vehement denial, so palpably true, filled me with fresh hope.

"I am thirsty. I suffer! I suffer!"

As I handed her a glass she looked up to me with a distrusting glance and whispered: "You are not ill. How, why, are you attending to me?"

Her mind seemed to be wandering.

I asked myself: "What then did occur if she did not take poison voluntarily?"

She pushed the glass aside with a delirious gesture: "No, no! They have given me of the poisoned soup."

"Barbara, what are you talking about? You are delirious. Nobody has given you of a poisoned soup. You yourself—"

She regarded me for a moment with a look of comprehension and rapt attention and interrupted me in a terror-stricken voice: "I myself—you know it, then?"

"I believed that she was about to confess her attempt at suicide. But she fell back and continued with a delirious vehemence: "They changed the plates somehow. It is terrible. I was crazy. It was a mad thing to do. They should have had pity."

Her eyes closed again. I listened appalled and bewildered. I could not understand the connection. Finally I began to ask myself which of us two came nearer losing his reason.

I held her head in my hands and despairingly appealed to her: "Barbara! Speak! Be clear! Trust me! I pity you. I would give my life to save you. Banish this terrible suspicion. Nobody has poisoned you. What are you saying about the plates? No one has changed any pl—"

I suddenly stopped as if I had met an insurmountable obstacle. The simple word "changed" altered the direction of my thoughts and seemed to throw a new light on the situation. It conjured up a scene that was a revelation. A thread of cobweb seemed to cross the trend of my thoughts and it transformed them. And my thoughts "changed" their course.

It was brief and decisive. I knew all. There was now not the slightest doubt about it.

A chilly brightness, a deadly iciness gripped my soul. The pitiless certainty stunned me. Yes, indeed, I had changed the plates. And the spider knew why. This apparently so trifling incident had escaped my memory. The present moment revealed its momentous importance—a terrible, a stupendous importance. My life, saved by a miserable little accident, appeared to me suddenly wretchedly worthless. All love, all joy had gone out of it. I felt sadder than the saddest thing of this world.

The man who in the next moment bent low over the sick bed was no longer the husband of a worshiped wife, no longer the Hubert Lasneret of an hour ago; he was merely a poor lonely man at the bedside of an unfortunate creature; a soul from the wretched herd of those who suffer and strive to attain the heights of pity.

In her rambling she repeated: "They have changed the plates. The poison! Hubert! Arsenic." These words, alternating with moans, seemed to circle and whirl in her fevered brain.

I watched at her side and mechanically attended to the duties of humanity.

In the corner of the chamber I observed a spider that stolidly moved up and down while weaving his web, the strange mute witness of a tragedy. During the night she called me: "Hubert!" Her voice had again the ring of the peaceful days of the past. Her features seemed no longer racked with pain. The anxious sorrowing love that had filled my heart but a few brief hours back was no longer there. In order to make all things clear I spoke with calmness: "Barbara, in your delirium you spoke of changed plates. I do not know what this may have to do with your illness. This is certain, however, that when you left the table at luncheon I did not think that you would return. A spider had descended from the ceiling upon my plate. You know my horror of spiders. Well, I just took your plate of soup and put mine in its place. These are the plain facts."

She did not reply a word. Her features expressed a nameless fear. Later she breathed in a hoarse whisper: "Must I, then, die? What dreadful punishment!"

"Poor woman!" I said and attempted to fold her in my arms.

"Do not touch me! If you but knew! Why, oh, why, did you threaten to kill Boutteville in a duel?"

She cried it out in her mortal agony.

This name, uttered by her in such an hour, finally robbed me of my self-possession. In order to save that man she had been willing to sacrifice me in cold blood! I seized her hand and roughly said: "Silence! Do not utter that name again! Do not carry into another world the idle illusion which has robbed us both of happiness! I speak to you unsparingly, but it must be done. You were misguided by falsehoods. I have long kept my silence. But the hour for truth has come. I married you when you were absolutely poor. Your father died a ruined man. I married you because I loved you above all else on earth. I wooed you when de Boutteville had withdrawn his suit in consequence of your father's ruin. He came near you again after your marriage. A married woman! Of course, no obligation is involved there. I despise him because he spurned you, and I hate him, because while you were at my side you yearned after that sorry hero and blamed me for the cowardice of that poltroon. Now you know all, but it is all too late."

Had I told her this a few days ago, her indomitable pride would have recoiled in wild indignation, and she would never have forgiven me for the humiliation my words involved. But today, chastened by a higher power, she listened without reply. I saw an expression of loathing curl her lips, as if she had crushed under foot a venomous snake.

Then she broke down and soft, despairing sobs shook her frame.

Still the same night. I am watching the spider who is pursuing his weaving task undisturbed. I am watching the busy insect without a trace of the gratitude I owe to one of his kind. There is a popular superstition which ascribes to spiders some mysterious office of messenger and herald. But I cannot feel grateful to him for a deliverance that means the cutting off of a life that was as dear to me as my own.

A moan rings through the air.

"Hubert!" Her arms are wound around my neck; she clings to me like a shipwrecked mariner to a rock. She stammers: "It is—as if there were a God. I fear—save me!"

Suddenly she utters an agonized cry: "Forgive me, Hubert! I die because I sought your life. I am blinded, crazed! Your jealousy drove me to despair. I was innocent. But it was I that—"

I lay my hands on her lips. "Enough! I know all, Barbara!"

Her confession brought me nearer to her again.

Who was I that I should judge her? Were we not both equally guilty? Had not my jealousy driven her to the paths of crime?

I knelt down at her side and embraced her: "We can forgive one another. I, too, have sinned, blinded by passion."

She raised her eyes. The wonderful blue that once had sparkled in her pupils had dulled, but the ennobling power of forgiveness had kindled in them something that had never shone for me in the days of her triumphs and glory.

That visionary glance seemed to radiate hope and promise that life could no longer realize.

And in that momentary transfiguration we both realized what a masterpiece of human happiness had been ours to enjoy—a masterpiece of which we had made a sorry mess!

For some time we regarded each other in silence; then her limbs twitched convulsively. Her eyelids dropped and she collapsed utterly.

Cries of pain ring through the silence of the night.

The physician administers to the dying woman, laboring hard to ease her pains.

My head clasped in my hands, I look through the open window and see the Deliverer stalking through the blossoming garden; with hesitating hand he breaks the branch of peace for her penance.

Towards dawn Barbara was dead. An unrecognizable and lifeless shell was all that was left of that once glorious creature. But the spider, on whose thread had hung the fate of two human beings, still weaves his web, undisturbed and mysterious, in the corner of the death-chamber.

Auto Notes

A. H. Piepenburg, one of the best known automobile men on the Pacific Coast and the holder of many world records made in speed contests, hill-climbs and on tracks, has joined the salesforce of the Studebaker Bros. Company under manager John H. Eagal.

Finished in the most handsome red that has ever been seen in the west, a new Studebaker-Garford "40" roadster was received from the Studebaker factory a few days ago by the local Studebaker branch. Automobile men who have seen the new car describe the machine as having the most graceful, racy lines of any machine that has ever been on the Coast.

The Diamond Rubber Company reports that B. E. Nixon, C. E. Gray and Western Garage, Martland Tires & Vulcanizing, Victory Motor Company, Moore Motor & Supply Company, the Oakland Traction Company and Osen & Hunter are recent purchasers of the new Diamond Grip Anti Skid Casings.

Writing from Watsonville, R. W. Eaton pays some compliments to a Studebaker E-M-F "30" which he has been using for several months. He says: "I have just returned from a trip to Fresno and made 425 miles, using 36 gallons of gasoline and one gallon of oil. This is about twelve miles to the gallon. There was a lot of sand and I crossed the Pacheco Pass twice. Do you think this machine ought to do better? I had an abundance of power and am well pleased with the car."

C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast Manager of the Diamond Rubber Company, was an interested spectator at the San Jose race meet and is now wearing the usual Diamond smile. "Not only did they win the five-mile events in equipping the 'Comet,'" said Mr. Mathewson, "but by the Thomas car winning the fifty-mile race in 52 minutes and 6 seconds, we made a clean sweep of all the regular races. This being practically the last meet of the season, we close with a record to be proud of. Not only did we capture the Portola $3000 cup but also the world's stock car record at Santa Monica. We also won the Portland and Santa Rosa races, the Decoration Day twenty-four hour event, the Los Angeles and San Diego round trip record, the San Francisco and Los Angeles record. Diamond tires finished with the original air in all four."

Reports that the road through Niles Canyon is in good shape again are said to be false by Tom T. Roe of the Studebaker Bros., who recently had occasion to drive a Studebaker E-M-F "30" from this city to Tracy in making delivery of a car.

Frank Cox of Westley and his family are greatly enjoying the use of a new Chalmers-Detroit 30-horsepower car, which Mr. Cox purchased recently. Several trips have been made to Modesto and to Stockton, the car averaging sixteen miles to the gallon of gasoline. Charles O'Day of the Pioneer Automobile Company accompanied Mr. Cox to his home and remained with him for a few days until he was familiar with the car. Mr. Cox now handles it with perfect ease and is quite an enthusiast. O'Day reports the roads in very good condition between here and Westley by way of Livermore.

Word has been received here that the Chalmers-Detroit Motor Company has received its first order for a 1911 model. Charles Ross of Little Rock, Ark., has placed the order. Mr. Ross says that he does not know what the plans of the Chalmers-Detroit Company are for 1911, but that he has had such satisfaction out of the "40" he now owns, and has such confidence in the Chalmers-Detroit Company that he believes the car will give him satisfaction.

The Pioneer Automobile Company, from telegrams received during the past week, feels very much encouraged in regard to shipping conditions in connection with the various factories. Since the fifteenth of the month there have been shipped to the local agency twenty-five cars of the different models of the Chalmers "30", twelve of the 40-horsepower touring cars and roadsters, twelve Hudson runabouts and two carloads of Thomas cars—one carload of the new Model "H" six-cylinder, and one carload of the Model "F" 4-60's. This makes a total of fifty-five cars shipped. "At this rate," says Manager E. P. Brinegar, " we should be caught up on deliveries by Christmas, or not later than January 1st."

Dr. A. W. Kirk, who took delivery of a new Chalmers-Detroit runabout recently and drove it from Oakland to Palo Alto via San Jose, reports that his speedometer showed sixty-six miles, and by careful measurement he used just four gallons of gasoline, or at the rate of sixteen and one-half miles per gallon. The doctor is much pleased with the economy of the car as shown on this trip.

Lee Jones of Modesto, accompanied by R. S. Luther of the Pioneer Automobile Company as driver, made a remarkably fast drive from San Francisco to Modesto recently in one of the 1910 Chalmers-Detroit "40" roadsters. They left the Ferry Building on the 3:20 p. m. boat and arrived in Modesto at 6:50, the entire trip being made in considerably less than four hours. Eliminating the trip across the bay, the run from Oakland Pier was made in three hours or less. The party went eight miles out of its way north of Ripon, taking the wrong road by mistake. Otherwise the trip would have been made in quicker time. Mr. Jones will use the machine until the arrival of the touring car which he has ordered.

Frederick B. Moscovic, the well known eastern designer of automobiles, is spending a few weeks on the Coast, and passed through this city recently. In speaking of the new 1910 models, Mr. Moscovic states that he thinks there is more value in the Chalmers-Detroit 30-horsepower car than in any other that has ever been turned out in this country. "I have just spent a few days at the factory," said he, "and after studying this organization and the way they do things in their factory, I can well understand why they are so far in the lead over other American manufacturers of cars."

Among the recent purchasers of Hudson runabouts in this city are C. Parker Holt and L. J. Cowgill. These gentlemen expect to take early delivery of their cars.

Chalmers-Detroit "30" rounabouts have been purchased by Dr. Thomas X. Sullivan, C. S. Laumeister and W. J. Wilson.

A Romance of Court and Camp

"A Gentle Knight of Old Brandenburg" rejoices in a title which may be accepted literally, for Adolph, the Margrave of Schwedt, concealed beneath his ungainly exterior and his predilection for over much beer as kindly and chivalrous a soul as ever was bestowed on man. Singularly enough, for a romantic tale of courts and camps, Charles Major has chosen to eliminate the swashbuckling braggart full of strange oaths and daringly lawless deeds, and even his secondary hero, "the Handsome Captain," comports himself soberly. The time and the scenes have to do with the court of that King, Frederick William, father of Frederick the Great, whom we must believe to be at least half mad if we would not judge him wholly bad. The tale begins by introducing us to the Margrave of Bayreuth in conversation with his son, the Hereditary Prince, over a matrimonial proposal which they have reason to believe is about to be placed before them. Both are averse to the alliance, but dire political disaster is likely to follow a refusal, so, to avert the calamity Prince Frederick Henry proposes to disappear, leaving his father in ignorance of his whereabouts in order that he may be able, at least, to procrastinate. As Prince Frederick Henry has already been something of a soldier of fortune, the plan, which is feasible, is put into operation at once, the intention of the prince being to proceed to England and enter the British army. Before he had been long on the road he was overtaken by a detachment of soldiers who took him prisoner, and knowing that a disclosure of his identity would liberate him from any undesirable situation, he was, for the moment, indifferent to his destination. At a wayside inn he encountered Adolph, Margrave of Schwedt, whose wit and good humor commended themselves to him and it was from Adolph that he received the key to his situation. He had been kidnaped because his six feet of stature made him a desirable recruit to that regiment of giant dragoons which was the chief object of King Frederick William's solicitude. The Margrave of Schwedt also confided to his new friend the fact that his own destination was also Berlin, whither he had been summoned as a possible husband for the unfortunate Princess Wilhelmina, eldest daughter of the king, and joint subject, with her brother Frederick, of the unnatural father's hatred. Wilhelmina was to be given her choice between the grotesque Margrave and the altogether dissolute Duke of Wessenfels, both of whom were supposed to be tractable subjects in the hands of the Austrian spies who dominated the royal court. But Adolph, the Margrave of Schwedt, despite his ungainly body and inexpressive countenance, was far from being the fool they supposed. He honestly loved the poor princess and was unwilling to be the cause of any unpleasantness to her. He hoped to win her by his devotion to her and in any case, to save her from a worse fate, for, ere long, it developed that if she did not signify her willingness to accept Adolph she would be forced, after revolting indignity, to marry the dissolute duke, and at the same time a sentence of death would be carried out upon the crown prince and all his friends. Arrived in Berlin, the Prince of Bayreuth, still concealing his identity, decided to accept service in the regiment, and his military ability secured for him at once a commission as captain. His quick wit enabled him to be of service at once to the unfortunate Prince Frederick, but the undoubted favor in which he stood with the king rendered his position a trying one, for father and son were mutually distrustful, and the friends of one became thereby the enemies of the other. But Prince Henry Frederick, owing to his own high rank, felt secure from penalties that might be inflicted on others, and displayed an independence which pleased as much as it startled the monarch. He speedily lost his heart to the unfortunate princess who reciprocated his attachment despite her certainty of its hopelessness. The younger princess, Charlotte, "Don't Care," complicated heart interests by herself falling in love with "the handsome captain" and signaling him out for her special favors, and when, as a bit of court gossip, he learned that an alliance between Princess Charlotte and the Hereditary Prince of Bayreuth (himself) was about to be proposed, he was obliged to resort to diplomacy in order to divert her vagrant fancy. We are given more than a glimpse of the intrigues by which it was hoped that Prussia and Brandenburg would be absorbed by Austria; of the incredible parsimony practiced in the royal household, the bickerings between parents and children, the sessions of the "Tobacco Parliament," and the selfishness and self seeking of all save the anonymous captain who eventually won both the heart and the hand of the princess. One of the most serious faults to be laid at the door of writers of romantic novels of other times is the artificial difficulty which they create for their readers by trying (and usually failing) to reproduce the language of the day. Mr. Majors has wisely refrained from such an attempt. His diction is modern in the extreme and he has not even attempted to Teutonize it. The result is that he has achieved the effect of an old story retold rather than of an old manuscript badly translated by some boggling amateur. The best that can be expected of a historical romance is that it will send readers back to real history for their facts, and "A Gentle Knight of Old Branderburg" is well calculated to do that much. Published by the Macmillan Company.

"Why are you so pleased?"
"I have received a delightful telegram from my fiancee."
"What is it about?"
"She says she has become engaged to another fellow."

Yes, I'm a bride and I feel as if I were in the seventh heaven.

Have you been married six times before?

Flirtation

Let us follow now, one after the other, the successive periods over which flirtation can, and sometimes does, pass before it reaches that crisis which may transform the operette into an opera, and the innocent, insignificant by-play into a drama full of tears and blood. The other afternoon, for instance, you have called upon a lady whom you seldom visit. On that day you showed yourself good-humored and even witty; she used to classify you among those callers whom one has to receive out of social duty, and she is quite surprised as well as charmed, to find so much pleasure in your company. When you leave, you have grown more satisfied with yourself and her. It seemed almost as if you had discovered her. A few days later you call on the same lady again; this time she is alone and is visibly pleased by your coming. She begins teasing you in a way she never had before. You answer in the same tone, and this alone might be called flirtation. Perhaps, about that time, you have some serious attachment in some other quarter, and the fact of conversing in this light, airy tone with another woman has all the piquancy of a demi-infidelity. Little by little, you contract the charming habit of visiting your flirt with a perfectly quiet conscience, since you feel sure never to fall in love with her. Your new friend, on her side, although most earnestly devoted to her duties, discovers an ever new charm in this close proximity to a danger the existence of which she refuses to admit. It is just like the candy she is munching half the afternoon. She is not taking a meal, but only tasting sweets. Besides, if there is also, on her side, some serious affection toward somebody else, she finds it great fun to render this "somebody else" just a little bit jealous, so that he may hold in higher value the happiness granted him. This is what might be called the honeymoon of a flirtation; it is something like the minor motive in a sonata: the melody is there, but it is so faint and so vaguely indicated that it just caresses the ear without forcing it to listen. We are reaching now the second period of this interesting situation. One, or both, of the two flirts is, or are, beginning to suffer the first symptoms of an indescribable uneasiness. She has been discovering that he is very deeply in love with somebody else, and rather illogically imagines that he has been deceiving her all along. Why does she think so? She couldn't tell, since she doesn't love him and would feel much embarrassed if he did love her. But vanity is made of such paradoxes. He, on his side, is made aware by some accident that there is a masculine affection hidden in this woman's life, and that she is bound in that direction as solidly as she is insignificantly attached to him. He didn't mind at first to be counted simply as a kind of appetite-opener, but that was when he thought the dinner only of an indifferent kind. Now that he knows the table is spread with all the luxuries of the season, he finds himself rather too candid, and, to say the word, he feels himself victimized. So, one fine morning—by the way, why do we always speak of fine mornings, when in general the early hours are just the reverse—well, one morning, fine or otherwise, she is struck with the idea that you are observing, with too strict fidelity, the tacit understanding existing between you. On your side, you get up decided to prove to her that you are worth troubling her imagination a little more. From that moment dates the most surprising unevenness in her humor as well as in yours. You begin addressing each other sundry remarks that are more biting than tender; she occasionally makes even fun of you, thrusting such witty sallies as are apt, sometimes, to touch you to the quick. Yourself are apt to indulge in jealout inquisition, acting almost as awkwardly as the most obtuse of husbands. A storm is evidently brewing, and your nerves suffer from the amount of electricity in the atmosphere, although no clouds have yet appeared upon your horizon. Never fear; those clouds are coming, and with them lightning and thundering bolts, even hail, which is going to mow down those pretty daisies, the petals of which you had taken such pleasure picking together in the innocent bloom of your early flirtation. The third period is now on. There is no more question of honeymoon, and the sky has grown as black as the ink I write with, or the heart of my lady-love. The man has sworn that he would have this woman his own, and she, on her side, begins to display a well-acted indignation at the pretensions he dares to bring forward. Or perhaps it is the other way; she has felt her slight power over you dwindling to nothingness, and she is trying her very hardest to transform into sworn duties those attentions you so gladly manifested toward her at first; you rebel, and war is declared—and this war ends what I should call flirtation proper, and I have no occasion to pursue my study any farther.

—Paul Bourget.

Do you know that I saw you kiss my daughter?

Really? I was too engrossed to notice anyone else.

You want an extension of two weeks on this debt? Suppose you should die in that time?

World's Fair Reflections

The world's fair project has caught the imagination of the people of San Francisco and fired them with contagious enthusiasm. The whole secret of success in life is enthusiasm, the success of every great project is the triumph of enthusiasm, and behind the movement to celebrate the opening of the Panama Canal with a world's fair, there is enough enthusiasm to justify the prediction that the city by the Golden Gate will give a show of which the nations of the earth will sit up to take notice. We have abundantly proved our capacity to organize success on a large scale, and we shall certainly sustain our reputation for grit and gumption as well as for energy and enterprise in the accomplishment of the great task that we are about to undertake. The people of San Francisco are in need of no encouragement in this matter; they are sensible of the vast benefits that are bound to accrue from the prompt seizure of so pregnant an opportunity; of the importance of contributing so powerfully to the great impetus that is bound to be given to the tide of industrial progress when the isthmian canal is opened that there shall be no possibility of resistance, but it is none the less advisable to consider some of the less obvious advantages of such an exposition as we have resolved upon. These costly and colossal displays of ingenuity and splendor that are called world's fairs have something more than an ephemeral interest, and they do something more than stimulate the flow of the pactolian stream in the cities where they are held. Their educational influence is prodigious and lasting. Every city in which an international exposition has been held has learned that all their previous efforts at education were merely local crystallizations. In addition to shedding light on the competitive achievements of the principal nations in commercial contact and teaching important industrial lessons in the different branches of manufactures and arts, world's fairs have a considerable refining influence upon the people, awakening as they do an interest in the things that contribute to the sweetness and beauty of life. For much that is now regarded as of inestimable value to the people of this country we are indebted to the Columbian Exposition held at Chicago, which it would be just to regard as an epoch-maker though it had done nothing more than transform our homes; and that much it certainly accomplished. It was there that the people became conscious of the hideousness of their furniture and house decorations; there they learned that even those of scanty means can surround themselves with beautiful things, and there they acquired a taste for some of the spiritual joys of existence which mitigate the miseries that are always with us. Even our own little Mid-Winter fair was an epoch-maker, for as a result of its bringing hither Fritz Scheel and his orchestra it created in the masses a taste for good music. Now the World's Fair that we are to hold in 1915 will indubitably produce more good results than the average man is able to conceive at this time. So far the prospect is regarded exclusively from the commercial viewpoint, and from that it is of exceeding fascination. Moreover it is a most important viewpoint, and because of its importance we should endeavor to make it a fair of gigantic proportions. To that end we should seek the co-operation of all the States of the Pacific Slope, and of the South American States bordering on the Pacific. Not merely should we solicit their participation as exhibitors, for of course our solicitation in that direction will be universal, but we should urge them to join with us in giving the fair. It should be sufficient for us that the celebration of the opening of the Panama Canal take place in San Francisco.

A Dream Worth Realizing

Now that we are about to purchase the property of the Spring Valley Water Company thoughtful consideration should be given to the proposition involving the tract of land known as the Laguna de la Merced. Out of this tract the directors of the company wish to reserve a large section for speculative purposes. Now it is to be hoped that the city will become possessed of much the greater portion of the tract with a view to transforming the barren wastes into a beautiful public playground. The thought of converting this tract of land, which is larger than Golden Gate Park, into a park is not of recent birth. Twenty years ago it occupied the minds of men who looked into the future and thought of San Francisco's potentialities and of the things that we should avail ourselves of in pursuance of a plan to make this the most beautiful and attractive city in the world. They pointed out that a co-ordinated and articulated park and boulevard system which should include the picturesque Merced lakes, Golden Gate Park and the Presidio and have pre-eminent among its features the driveway along the ocean front, would be unsurpassed and in itself be sufficient to make any city famous. Now this is a fascinating dream no longer to be regarded as the image of fantastic hopes, but as susceptible of realization. Along with the prospect of a world's fair comes the perception of facilities for making this dream come true. We shall soon begin thinking of a site for our exposition grounds. What better site can be had than the Laguna de la Merced? For a world's fair we need a beautiful site and expansive grounds, and for this particular fair we need an ocean prospect, all of which are to be had on the banks of the beautiful lakes in the old Merced rancho. The opportunity has come to us of killing two birds with one stone. We should avail ourselves of it. In building for our fair we should seek to avoid as much as possible the wasting of money on ephemeral things. Permanence should be the watchword here as it was in Seattle. By thus keeping the future in mind we may have among the substantial net results of the exposition a new park of surpassing beauty.

Canal Calculations

In some quarters there is doubt as to whether the Panama Canal will be opened for navigation in 1915. It is believed, however, to be half finished, and the engineers are unable at this time to conceive of anything that might prevent them from finishing their labors within the time fixed by their methematical calculations, but experience teaches that facts and figures are often irreconcilable, and that problems solved on paper are not always to be relied upon. The canal engineers, eminent as they are in their profession, are far from approximating infallibility. In 1902 they estimated that the canal would cost $144,000,000 inclusive of police and sanitation. In 1906 they fell a-calculating again and estimated that the big ditch would cost $139,999,999 exclusive of the cost of police and sanitation. Now, according to the latest official report the total expenditure will be in the neighborhood of $375,000,000. It is explained that the increase is due to an addition of 50 per cent to the amount of work necessary to be done and 20 per cent to the cost of labor due to the enhanced cost of living, the difficulty of attracting labor from the United States and the introduction of the eight-hour day. Of course the engineers could not have anticipated the increase in the cost of labor, but that they should have fallen short in their calculations with reference to the amount of work to be done to the extent of 50 per cent is well nigh incredible. A good guesser might have come much nearer the mark.

Puritanical Revolt in England

From England, home of George Bernard Shaw, champion of liberty and contemner of the prudishness and puritanism that flourish in American soil, comes the astonishing news that there is organized revolt against literature that is designed to gratify prurient tastes and lickerish appetites. This revolt has not been organized by illiterate maiden ladies or squeamish gentlemen of the pulpit, but by the enlightened Publishers Association and the by no means benighted Libraries Association of London. This is astonishing enough, but somewhat more astonishing is the news that H. G. Wells is one of the authors who have occasioned the revolt. Mr. Wells is one of England's "advanced thinkers." He has the merit of thinking with the minority and consequently the pleasure of being misunderstood by the masses, but his thoughts when they are not employed in the development of extravagant fiction are generally absorbed in theses of a political or austerely sociological nature. We have never known him to compete with George Bernard Shaw in the elucidation of shocking theories of domestic morality. But it appears that in his latest book he has exposed himself to the charge of discussing in plain English a subject that is barred in polite society. This he has not done for the purpose of exciting gross and vulgar emotions after the manner of the author of "Three Weeks," or after the manner of some of the classic writers whose works are treasured as specimens of art; he was imbued with the most laudable of motives, that of calling attention to an evil custom. Nevertheless his book has been pronounced poisonous by the Spectator, and it is now the subject of a sharp public controversy. Mr. Wells having the courage of his convictions, says: "My book was written primarily to express the resentment and distress which many women feel nowadays at their unavoidable practical dependence upon some individual man not of their deliberate choice and full sympathy with the natural but perhaps anarchistic and anti-social idea that it is intolerable for a woman to have sexual relations with a man with whom she is not in love; also, to express the idea that it is not natural and desirable and admirable for her to want them." He says that while these may be very shocking ideas it is not the first time they have crept into literature, and that he believes a case can be made out for tolerating their discussion. "The case," he says, "lies in the fact that the opposite arrangement by which a woman is subdued first to her father and then to a husband of his choice, is not in our present phase of civilization working satisfactorily." The fact is, he declares, that the custom is not giving the modern State enough children or fine enough children for its needs." To this the Spectator has replied that Mr. Wells "has written a book which glorifies incontinence and yielding to lustful impulse." And thus the discussion goes serenely on much to the delight of the publishers of Mr. Wells's book. Meanwhile the agitation started by the Publishers Association and the Libraries Association engages widespread attention, and is so pregnant with the possibility of infringement upon the liberty of the press, that England's foremost critic, Edmund Gosse, has taken occasion to utter a solemn note of warning. It may result, he fears, in a censorship of the press by the side of which the censorship of the stage will be child's play. "It is an unheard of tyranny," he says, "and if it had been exercised fifty years ago would have prevented the circulation and sale of Darwin's 'Origin of Species.'" To give emphasis to his views, Mr. Gosse has been quoting Milton's "Areopagitica," which can always be relied upon for forceful argument against those who would shackle the press. It was Milton's idea that in the interest of truth it is better to vouchsafe an ephemeral existence for the pernicious than that action should be taken to end all liberty of publication. The thing that is being lost sight of in England is that there is a fashion in reading as well as in dress and that it last only for the season.

A Perennial Controversy

The Shakespeare-Bacon controversy has broken out afresh. The Baconians have discovered another cryptograph in the works of the great philosopher, one that indicates the location of a cave wherein is buried the story of the deception that was practiced on the Elizabethan public by William Shakespeare. The supposition is that as soon as the hidden documentary proofs are brought to light the worshipers of Shakespeare will not have a leg to stand on. While it must be admitted that some pretty strong arguments can be brought to bear in support of the proposition that Shakespeare never had the opportunity to acquire the learning displayed in the plays attributed to him, yet we have never been able to persuade ourselves that Bacon had any hand in those extraordinary products of genius. The most salient of all the characteristic qualities of the Shakespeare plays is humor, which unquestionably is the one intellectual quality in which Francis Bacon is deficient. In Bacon's acknowledged writings there is never a gleam of humor. Furthermore Bacon lived the life of a man that was utterly devoid of a sense of humor. There is nothing that we know of that is harder to believe than that Francis Bacon was the creator of Falstaff. Another thing that dissuades us from the belief that Bacon wrote the plays is the manifest feebleness of his power of versification. That the poetic faculty was in him well developed cannot be questioned but he was more of a poet in his prose than in his verse. The author of the Shakespeare plays at his worst, was never so infelicitous in versification as was Bacon when he produced his pretentious translation of the palms wherein he scarcely rises above the dignity of doggerel.

Two shall be born the whole wide world apart,
And speak in different tongues, and have no thought
Each of the other's being, and no heed;
Yet these o'er unknown seas to unknown lands
Shall cross; escaping wreck, defying death,
And all unconsciously shape every act
And bend each wandering step unto this end,
That one day out of darkness they shall meet,
And read life's meaning in each other's eyes.

And two shall walk some narrow way of life
So closely side by side, that should one turn
Ever so little space to left or right,
They needs must stand acknowledged face to face;
Yet these with groping hands that never clasp,
With wistful eyes that never meet, and lips
Calling in vain on ears that never hear,
Shall wander all their weary days unknown
And die unsatisfied. And this is Fate!

The Question of the Authenticity of a Wax Bust Attributed to the Great Italian Artist Still Agitates Europe in General But Germany is Satisfied Because the Kaiser Has Spoken

By Robert McTavish

Seldom has the world of artists and near-artists been so overwrought as it has been since Dr. Wilhelm Bode, director of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum of Berlin, paid $40,000 to a London antiquarian for a wax bust supposed to have been modeled by Leonardo da Vinci. Ever since that simple little transaction men who consider themselves experts in the sculpture of the Renaissance and other men who pride themselves on their keen scent for artistic forgeries have been hurling gallons of ink at one another. It is indeed a poor and unprogressive art critic who has not expressed his valuable opinion on this bit of business dealing between the German doctor and the English tradesman and as the controversy is one which is being taken seriously by the greatest journals of Europe, it is easy to understand why everybody with pretensions to art-erudition should wish to have his little say in the affair. On the one side are those who insist that Dr. Bode has acquired for the Berlin museum an inestimable treasure of antiquity, a perfect production of one of the world's greatest masters of art, worthy the study and veneration of all who love the beautiful. On the other side are the goodly battalions of those who, without mincing words, declare that the worthy director of the museum has allowed himself to be buncoed, that he paid a ridiculously high price for a worthless fake and that he has forever damned his critical acumen by allowing himself to be taken in by a plausible dealer. Of course, as always happens in disputes of this peculiarly diverting kind, very little attention is paid to the intrinsic worth of the bust in question. The attitude of the world of artists and near-artists is that unless it is proved to be the work of da Vinci it is entirely without value. This is apt to surprise those of us who do not pretend to be unerring art critics. It might be supposed that if a wax bust appeared to be worth $40,000, it would be worth that price without regard to the name and fame of the artist by whom it was made. But to hold such an opinion and to have the hardihood to express it would expose one to the withering scorn of those who know all about art—or think they do. The canons of criticism provide a more complicated system for the appraisement and appreciation of objects of art. If that bust is not the work of da Vinci, it may still be very beautiful; it may even approximate perfection in its waxen retention of the soul of an ideal conception. But it is not worth $40,000. Why not? That is one of the esoteric mysteries of art which may not be expounded to the satisfaction of the uninitiate. Suffice that it is so.

The controversy over the wax bust will probably continue for a long time. It may or it may not be definitely settled some day, as was the similar bitter dispute which waged over the famous or infamous tiara of Saitapharnes purchased at great cost for the Museum of the Louvre and afterwards found to be a rank and clumsy fake. But as far as Germany is concerned there is no longer any controversy over the wax bust which has the place of honor in the Kaiser Friedrich Museum. That great art critic, the Kaiser himself, has pronounced in favor of its authenticity and it would be lese majeste for any Teuton to raise his voice in a tone of dubiety when word has come from the throne.

The whole story of the wax bust is interesting, if not diverting. Let us approach it in as serious a manner as we can. Sometime ago Dr. Bode paid a visit to London. Now Dr. Bode is indeed a great personage in Berlin and elsewhere. He has done great things for the Kaiser Friedrich Museum at an expenditure of great sums. The Kaiser believes in him and this confidence on the part of imperial majesty has always been reflected in the conduct of Dr. Bode. It is said that he rules his museum with the serene arrogance of a proconsul administering a province; in fact he has been dubbed the "von Moltke of the museums." Dr. Bode considers himself especially at home when the subject is the sculpture of the Renaissance. That is his hobby; he has written and talked so much about it that it has been the habit of other art-experts to close their mouths and let the ink dry on their pens when Dr. Bode discourses on this tremendous department of culture.

THE BUST WITH THE MONNA LISA SMILE

Which the Kaiser, and therefore all Germany, believes to have been modeled by da Vinci.

Naturally, when Dr. Bode visited London his arrival was duly signalized in the press; naturally his doings were carefully studied and minutely described. One day Dr. Bode, in quest of treasures for his darling museum, visited the shop of Murray Marks, a well known London dealer in antiquities. There he found the much-talked-of wax bust. It is the bust of a woman, modeled lifesize with a bit of drapery below the bare breasts, a smiling face, broken arms and a coiffure with flowers. Dr. Bode looked it over with a critical eye and asked its price. Murray Marks was willing to let it go for $40,000. Dr. Bode was willing to take it for that sum and take it he did. After the deal was completed he announced to the eager public, always interested, if not in art at least in the prices paid for art treasures, that he had secured a splendid specimen of the sculpture of Leonardo da Vinci.

How did he know it? That was easy. In the first place the bust displayed the celebrated Monna Lisa smile. In the second place it was modeled exactly on

Charles W. Morse, Ice King and Convict

Being a Brief Account of the Amazing Career, Financial as Well as Matrimonial, of a Money Wizard Who Has Seen a Fortune of Twenty-two Millions Blotted Out But Who is by No Means Incapable of Rehabilitat ing Himself

By Francis Bartlett

When the gate of a federal prison shuts upon Charles W. Morse, the ice king, one of the most spectacular careers in the history of this country will be interrupted. I say "interrupted" advisedly for it would indeed be rash to declare that even a stiff sentence of imprisonment would be sufficient to daunt the amazing courage of this wizard of frenzied finance. Morse has seen a fortune of $22,000,000, every cent of it accumulated by himself, swept away like a feather in the wind and an indebtedness of $7,000,000 heaped up in its stead; but even while the judge was pronouncing sentence upon him he was revolving schemes, not only for the conquest of liberty but also for the rehabilitation of his stricken fortunes. In his rise and in his downfall Morse has given the country many thrills; his whole life has been a romance of mystery, daring and struggle against tremendous adversaries. It is probably too soon yet to say that he worked and plotted in vain; he may yet rise superior to events that would break the heart of another man. Another fortune may be built when he emerges from prison, his head filled with enterprises matured in dreary confinement.

Not the least remarkable episode in the career of this Wall street magician who seemed to evoke millions from nowhere was the story of his matrimonial entanglements—a story which even today is only imperfectly understood. Abe Hummel appears in this part of the Morse drama, truly a most sinister figure, evoking memories of the scandals which clustered about the hoary head of Colonel Mann of "Town Topics" not so long ago. Hummel was caught in the meshes of the Morse matrimonial mix-up and as a result he went to jail for a year and to Europe as an exile afterwards.

Morse's first wife had been dead some time when he married the woman whose recent fight to get him released on bail and to save him from going to jail has attracted almost as much attention as Morse has himself. This woman was the divorced wife of Charles F. Dodge when she married Morse in 1901 after having been his housekeeper for some years. Morse was then piling up the big fortune he was after and with her he moved into a fine house in Fifth avenue. On January 7, 1904, attention was attracted to a decree, filed in an unusual way in the Supreme Court, annulling Morse's marriage to this wife. It turned out that the two had separated a few weeks before and Mrs. Morse had gone to stay at Lakewood while Morse occupied his house alone. From that time on for two years the criminal and civil courts were busy with this strange case—"a live wire," as District Attorney Jerome once called it when the plot was thickest and sparks hovered around the heads of many well known lawyers. Briefly summarized, it may be said that Charles F. Dodge, the woman's former husband, had suddenly appeared and contended that he had never been served in the divorce proceedings, and that the woman was still his wife. William A. Sweetser, the woman's lawyer in the divorce action, then unearthed documents showing that Dodge had been served properly, whereupon Morse asked leave to intervene and reopen the entire Dodge divorce proceedings. Justice Truax finally declared that the divorce decree was valid. The annulment decree was never made final, so that the Morses did not have to remarry. For almost a year while the courts were probing the case they lived apart and the entire proceedings were surrounded with mystery. What tended to deepen the mystery was Morse's own behavior in refusing to answer questions put to him by the grand jury tending to clear up the case. Abe Hummel was Dodge's lawyer. When Mr. Jerome sought to bring Dodge to New York there ensued a chase through Texas in which a vast sum of money was expended in order to keep Dodge from his clutches, but he was finally landed in New York, and as a result of a confession Hummel was indicted and tried for perjury. It was brought out at the trial that Capt. Jim Morse, Morse's uncle, had paid Hummel $77,850 to break up his marriage with Mrs. Dodge "for the honor of the family." Hummel's trial was one of the most sensational that New York ever saw. Hummel, who was said to be absolutely broke after serving his time in jail, has since decorated the show places of Europe, liberally supplied with money from some unknown source.

Morse's career as a money-getter began when he graduated from Bowdoin with the class of 1877. His father had been in the ice business in Maine, that is to say, he was one of those who cut ice on the Penobscot and sold it in friendly competition with other dealers. It struck Morse that the business was a good one but that the way to thrive in it was not to cut too much ice, so that when summer came there would be a chance to get high prices for it. This idea took him to New York where he worked very quietly for several years. He began to emerge from comparative obscurity in 1890. About that time some of the ice companies woke up to the fact that Morse had quietly cornered the supply of Maine ice and that to buy any they would have to pay him his own price. They did buy it, but some of them couldn't pay for it and Morse took stock instead. That gave him control of the companies. Morse had planned to put the price of ice up, and it did go up. It went up to 60 cents a hundred pounds at the piers. Naturally that invited competition, in view of the fact that nature makes ice in abundance; but when competitors looked into things they found that Morse had been a politician as well as an ice man. There wasn't a dock along the waterfront where they could discharge a cargo of ice. Tammany was in control then and Tammany was the friend of Charles W. Morse. Up went the stock of his American Ice Company to 90 and up went the fortunes of the Tammany friends of Charles W. Morse. Morse's American Ice Company had not alone bought out the ice companies, it had bought out the little dealers as well, paying them sometimes as much as $500 for their routes and threatening them with dire things if they broke agreements not to sell again. The fuss that was made when the price of ice went soaring made a lot of trouble for Mr. Morse and brought his name for the first time prominently before the public. His ice company was sued for being a monopoly and all sorts of proceedings were started. The same fuss also brought trouble for Mr. Morse's Tammany friends. First and foremost of these was Mayor Van Wyck. When hauled up and questioned on the stand it was discovered that he had bought 5,000 shares of Mr. Morse's ice company stock from Mr. Morse a short time before the price of ice went up and it began to be hard to land independent ice on any of the piers. Mr. Van Wyck had even gone into debt to Mr. Morse to get these shares. It was a great scandal but it was comparatively short-lived and when the public began to forget the indignities of the ice-trust the Tammany men were left in quiet enjoyment of their

MARY ELIZABETH FORBES AND HENRY HALL

Principals of "The Man from Home," the Booth Tarkington-Harry Leon Wilson play, coming to the Valencia Theatre for the holidays. From the original painting by Harrison Fisher.

"Under the Mistletoe"

Harrison Fisher's drawing, "Under the Mistletoe," for which Mary Elizabeth Forbes and Henry Hall posed, was first published on the cover of the Saturday Evening Post's Christmas number for 1908. It so pleased J. Ogden Armour, the Chicago millionaire, that he sent the artist a check without any amount written in, asking Mr. Fisher to name his price and to place him in possession of what he considered a charming work of art. Fisher got his start on the newspapers of this city and has now reached the enviable position of being able to ask as much as $800 for a magazine drawing. Miss Forbes regards her posing for this composition as one of the pleasantest incidents of her career.

Jinny: A Comedy

By Ashley Dukes

(It is a hot July afternoon. Upon the white, dusty road that leads from Aldershot to Basingstoke there is a village, clustering about a little Norman church. Beyond the churchyard, and neatly, modestly screened from the highway by a dense box hedge, lies the rectory with its garden. Subdued voices are heard, and a girl's voice cries: "Fifteen—Forty," "Thirty—Forty," above the clink of tea-cups and the murmur of conversation. A man appears in the distance, at the crest of the hill, and draws steadily nearer, tramping along with a good, dogged swing in the middle of the roadway. Presently one can see that he is ragged, unshaven, sunburnt. As he approaches another figure appears—that of a girl carrying a bundle, and following him boldly, marches up the path, and makes a leisurely survey of the house and garden. The rector's housekeeper appears at the door.)

Housekeeper (calls out)—Not today, thank you!

The Tramp regards her with interest.

Housekeeper (more decisively)—Not today. We don't want anything.

The Tramp—I do. Gimme somethink to eat. And drink.

Housekeeper—Not today. Go away.

The Tramp (mocking her tone contemptuously)—"Not today, not today, not today!"

Housekeeper—You are a rude man. Go away!

The Tramp (wearily)—"Go away!" Cawn't yer say somethink fresh? Or are yer wound up?

Housekeeper—We don't give to beggars.

The Tramp—I ain't beggin'. I'm arskin'.

Housekeeper (feebly)—Go away.

The Tramp—Go it, old girl! Wound up, that's wot you are! Tell me next that you'll set the dawg on me!

Housekeeper (impotently)—We haven't got a dog.

The Tramp (with satisfaction)—Ain't got no bloomin' dawg, ain't yer? That's all right. I'm a goin' ter sit down. (He subsides into a deck chair on the front lawn.)

Housekeeper (scandalized)—Get up! I shall send for the policeman—

The Tramp—Your bloomin' local copper's two miles up the road, sittin' in a ditch wiv a stop watch, lookin' out for motorists. Like ter fetch 'im? Nice walk for yer.

Housekeeper (at her wits' end)—I shall bring the master!

The Tramp (signing to her to come nearer)—'Ere. (She comes unwillingly)—'Ere. (Taking a dirty piece of paper from his pocket.) Your master. Is 'e the Reverend George Armitage, rector of Farnley?

Housekeeper—Yes.

The Tramp—And are you Miss Jane Pippin, 'is 'ousekeeper?

Housekeeper—I am.

The Tramp (surveying her critically)—Yus. You look it.

Housekeeper—Well, of all the—

The Tramp—'Ere. Stow it. Fetch 'im. (She hesitates.) There's my card. (He offers another piece of paper.) 'Erbert Cannon, out o' work. Now fetch 'im. I've come—on business.

The housekeeper takes the paper reluctantly, and retreats to the tennis lawn. Presently the rector appears, hurriedly putting on his coat.

Rector (to the housekeeper)—Where did you say? . . . Ah, I see— (He approaches cautiously.) Come, come, my good man! You can't stop here!

Cannon (looks him up and down without speaking.)

Rector (more peremptorily)—You can't sit here! This is my garden.

Cannon—I've come—on business.

Rector—Ah, exactly. . . . But the fact is, I am rather fully occupied at present. Perhaps later in the day—

Cannon (slowly)—That won't suit me. I've got a pressin' engagement.

Rector—Then I am afraid—

Cannon—Gimme something to eat. And drink.

Rector—I make it a rule not to—

Cannon—Gimmie wot I'm arskin' for!

Rector—Is that all your business with me?

Cannon—I'll tell yer wot my business is when I got food in me. Not before.

Rector—That is not the proper tone to adopt—

Cannon—I don't care. I ain't got no manners. The bloomin' upper clawsses 'ave pinched 'em all. I just arsk for wot I want.

Rector (wavering)—Perhaps—there are extenuating circumstances in your case. . . You are really hungry?

Cannon—Am I hungry? Get the grub!

Rector (hesitates, then calls)—Miss Pippin! (To Cannon)—Possibly—if you will go into the kitchen—we will see what can be done—

Cannon—I'd sooner 'ave it 'ere. Then I can talk to yer.

Rector—Really—that is quite impossible—

Cannon (calmly)—All right. I'll wait.

Rector (gives way reluctantly. To housekeeper)—Ah—perhaps you would be good enough to bring something to eat . . . . and (with a doubtful glance) possibly tea. . . ?

(Cannon grunts his assent.)

Rector (hastily)—And will you please ask them to excuse me at the tennis court; I shall remain here.

(Miss Pippin, visibly disapproving, brings the food and drink. Cannon eats ravenously without taking any notice of his companion. When he has done he investigates the interior of the teapot, turns it upside down. Empties the milk-jug into his teacup, drinks to the last drop, and leans back in the deck chair with satisfaction. Then he turns to the rector.)

Cannon—Got any terbaccer?

(Rector looks at him for a moment, then hands his pouch. Cannon fills his clay pipe with deliberation, borrowes a match, lights up and smokes tranquilly.)

Rector—Now—what is your business?

Cannon (slowly)—I want ter git married.

Rector—Indeed? May I ask—to whom?

Cannon—To Jinny.

Rector (glances at the scrap of paper in his hand)—Who is Jinny?

Cannon—Jinny Dawson. She's my gal. On tramp with me. (Pause.) She's expectin' a child. Next Michaelmas. She wants ter git married.

Rector (rises)—Do I understand that you are living together?

Cannon—Course we are.

Rector—And that you are the father of her child?

Cannon—Yus.

Rector—I am sorry to hear it—I cannot help you.

Cannon—You was recommended ter me.

Rector—By whom?

Cannon—Chap of the name o' Palmer. You give 'im yer gardenin' last summer.

Rector—Ah—I remember.

Cannon—'E recommended me ter you. "'E'll marry you," 'e says. "'E'll make a 'oly fuss about it, but 'e'll marry you if yer worry 'im long enough. Immorality's agin 'is principles. It's 'is business ter tie 'em up," 'e says.

(Rector coughs.)

Cannon—That's what I've come on, yer see. Business.

Rector—Is your—is this young person here?

Cannon—Yus. Outside. Shall I fetch 'er?

Rector (hastily)—One moment, please. You say that it is her wish that you should marry?

Cannon—Yus. I don't think much on it meself, but Jinny's mother was a Methodist . . . . and there's the kid, o' course. . . . We thought it was just as well, if we could find a parson 'andy.

She stood before the mirror, her red-brown hair fell in rich waves around her and through them she could see her gleaming white shoulders. She gazed with admiration at her own beauty and thought: "Oh, I am well worth the price!" At this thought a shiver went through her body and she felt a loathing.

He came up to where she stood and embraced her passionately, kissing her neck. She saw in the glass his yellow shrunken face, his cruel, cold eyes burning with sensuous lust, and grew very pale.

He felt that she shrank with anger and fear at his touch, and a very ugly expression appeared around his thin lips.

"Come, Magdalene," he said, "let us have a chat."

He made her sit near him upon the sofa and continued:

"Your father, Herr Schlosser, had very long fingers—just keep quiet, please—he had long fingers, so long that he landed them into my desk and stole from it 5,000 marks. You said he did it from bitter necessity—very good, my dear; I believed you and did not hand him over to the police. I let him have the big sum of money. His name was not disgraced through me. Now I want my reward. I want to be thanked for my good heart."

He buried his head in her hair and continued:

"You have nothing to complain of, Magdalene. Only yesterday morning you were a poor little bookkeeper, now you are ruling over me. You are my princess whom I have freed from her chains."

She sprang to her feet, deadly pale, with burning eyes.

"Chains? You are putting chains upon me! Chains with which you will drag me into the very mire! You have saved my father from disgrace only to drag his daughter into shameful sin."

He gazed at her, breathless from admiration; in her excitement she was wonderfully beautiful.

"Do you call it sin, Magdalene? Is it a sin to drink when one is thirsty? And I am thirsty for your beauty! Shall I let another pluck this red rose? I feel a hot desire for your burning lips, for you, your beauty, your youth!"

They were so excited that they did not hear the door of an inner chamber quietly open and suddenly before them appeared the masked figure of a man. They were numb with horror. Magdalene covered her face with her hands and her companion put his hand to his hip pocket.

"Leave your revolver where it is, if you really have one," said the man in the mask. "I am not a brutal robber. I am only a thief. My specialty is the nightly visit to the various hotels of the city. What I heard from your conversation—you must excuse me, I could not help it—has hindered me from taking your valuables. There is honor even between thieves; they do not rob one another. I did not want to rob a greater scoundrel than myself. Farewell!"

A dark shadow vanished through the door, the draft lifted Magdalene's hair. Outside their window on the canal mandolins and flutes played a sweet love song full of longing and pain.

The Spectator

An Illustrious Cit.

Mr. Harris Weinstock has come back to us from Europe, if not with a large stock of new ideas at least with renewed assurance of the esteem in which he is held by a grateful and thrifty press that never fails to appreciate the importance of justifying the large chest expansion of merchants that advertise extensively. By our alert and amiable contemporary, the Examiner, he is introduced to us on his return as a distinguished "philanthropist, humanitarian and student of labor conditions." Thus is it made obvious that it is worth while for a merchant who buys newspaper space by the yard to make occasional trips to Europe and from the distance that lends enchantment to the view appeal to friendly imaginations capable of transfiguring him beyond even his own power of recognition. Mr. Weinstock unquestionably is a student of labor conditions, and he is also as steadfast a friend of labor as any one of the Hale brothers. It is believed that when he marks down goods to something ninety-nine he has the welfare of labor at heart; and thus it is, perhaps, that he has established the reputation of being at once a philanthropist and humanitarian.

The Result of His Commission

As a student of labor conditions Mr. Weinstock is in the dilettante class. Indeed he is a dilettante in everything but drygoods, but he is regarded by a select body of disciples in the Commonwealth Club as the paramount authority on all philosophical questions. So when he started on his trip to Europe equipped with a special commission from the Governor of the State to look into the status of labor unions in other countries, his disciples were persuaded that he would accumulate so much knowledge in the course of his travels that on his return he would be prepared to solve all questions with reference to the difficulties that arise from time to time between employers and wage-earners. But with all due respect to Mr. Weinstock it must be here recorded that he disappointed expectations. He came back pregnant with suggestions, he gave an imitation of a mountain in labor, and he was delivered of nothing worth speaking about unless it be deemed worth while to express astonishment that at this late date the idea of solving the labor problem by arbitration should be regarded as something new. The amiable Examiner, with an inspiration from the business office, tells us that there were "some striking points in Mr. Weinstock's paper." These striking points were encomiums on labor unions and wage-earners which remind me of George Eliot's address to workingmen in "Felix Holt": "In my opinion there has been too much complimenting of that sort; and whenever a speaker, whether he is one of ourselves or not, wastes our time in boasting or flattery, I say, let us hiss him."

Our Famous Raconteur

Let us return for a few moments to the famous cocktail route, recollections of which I revived a week or so ago. I have been recalled thereto by John Farley, an artist in wet goods, who was one of the principal attractions on the cocktail route when that gay bohemian rendezvous constituted one of the distinctive charms of the City that Was. Mr. Farley has many claims upon our attention. One of the picturesque survivors of the mad, glad days of yore, he is now in his anecdotage, and as plethoric of reminiscences as of this world's goods, abounding at once in testimony of the pecuniary success that crowned the hospitality of the old cocktail route and of the liberality of the men that gave it their patronage. Mr. Farley is today a retired capitalist. He cuts coupons now with the same facility with which in other days he imparted to the stimulating dry gin cocktail that supreme distinction due to what he was wont to describe poetically as "the farewell of the bitters." But Farley was noted for other things besides his ability to endue any combination of liquors with a fascination equal to that of siren's voices. He was the raconteur par excellence of the cocktail route. When Henry Irving first came to San Francisco he discovered Farley, and he spent most of his leisure moments in a curtained recess of the old "Reception" listening to the reminiscences of his host. Oscar Wilde doted on Farley—for his mining camp folk lore—and pronounced him a second Bret Harte. Lawrence Barrett, Charley Reade, Billy Emerson, Bill Pinkerton and Captain Lees—all were Farley's familiars, and many an hour he held them entranced.

One of Farley's Stories

I came across Farley the other day in the "cooling room" of the Olympic Club where he was reclining with something of the air of one of the surfeited sybarites of old Rome whose figures are perpetuated in the pages of Petronius. Somebody said something about the opening of the new Palace Hotel and Farley at once opened the floodgates of memory and poured out a tragic tale with all his old-time dramatic power. I will try to reproduce his language. "In the seventies," he said, "there lived at the Palace Hotel two very interesting men. One was John C. Daly, a handsome fellow of athletic form and a man of education, a graduate, I believe, of either Yale or Harvard. The other was a Spaniard by the name of Derondo, a man in appearance somewhat effeminate. He wore a low collar and a fluffy shirt and on his wrist was a gold bracelet. Nobody knew anything much of the antecedents of these men. Shortly after their arrival in this city they opened a brokerage office, and they did a lot of entertaining in their rooms. Both were fine singers and musicians, one being an expert harpist and the other a wizard with the piano. One day Derondo entered the elevator in the old Palace and as he did so he accidentally stepped on the foot of Lesley C. Hanks, a Southern gentleman and a fire-eater. Derondo apologized but the apology was not accepted. Calling the Spaniard a vile name Hanks struck him a blow in the face which was not resented. The next day Daly met Hanks in the Palace courtyard, and with an oath he denounced the Southerner and went at him with the ferocity of a lion, giving him such a beating that he had to go to bed for a week. The next scene is Daly's apartments. Daly is alone. He is standing in front of a mirror shaving himself. Suddenly the face of Lesley C. Hanks is reflected in the mirror. He has noiselessly entered the room and locked the door. 'Now you ——— ———,' he exclaimed, 'I am going to kill you.' Before Daly could make a move Hanks drew his gun and fired. Daly fell and never again uttered a word. Hanks walked straight to police headquarters, and surrendered himself to Pat Crowley who was then the chief of police. The murderer was locked up in the steel-lined tanks in the basement of the old City Hall on Kearny street. Each day he was permitted to walk up and down in front of his cell, in a closed corridor directly beneath the sidewalk. Those were the days of the Kearny riots. In one corner of the corridor were some guns that had been seized by the police. One day Hanks discovered that one of these guns contained a cartridge, and he took it and blew his head off." Thus ending the story Farley turned over and went to sleep.

One of the Old Guard

Another reminder of the old cocktail route came across my path the other day in the person of Jere Driscoll, one of its most ardent habitues. Driscoll came into prominence many years ago as one of "Chris" Buckley's lieutenants. When Buckley found it expedient to levant over the border into Canada Driscoll deemed it discreet to change his place of residence also. He went to Chicago where he became a book-maker and fattened his bank account. When Eugene Schmitz came into power, Driscoll, who is related to him by marriage, came into prominence again, but when a grand jury began investigating municipal cribs Jere once more deemed San Francisco's climate uncongenial and went on a tour for his health. Now he is with us again, and apparently he is in fine fettle and well satisfied with the prospect which the old town once more affords.

The Quest of Detweiler

The reappearance of Mr. Jere Driscoll reminds me that we have yet to hear of the whereabouts of Mr. Detweiler of the Home Telephone Company, who vanished about two years ago as completely as though he had been swallowed by the earth. For a time it was believed that Detective William J. Burns was losing much beauty sleep on account of the difficulty he was experiencing in trying to get in touch with either hide or hair of the missing telephone magnate, but slowly the vagrant rumor got into circulation that Detweiler's absence was deemed more desirable than his presence. In time the story of the putative quest of Detweiler and of the reason why he was not wanted became so stale that even the man that winds up the ferry clock excluded it from his repertoire. In time it reached Los Angeles and then some of the people of that benighted village were able to appreciate the anxiety and unrest of their foremost reformers as well as their vociferations in approval of San Francisco's civic patriots. Detweiler, I believe, has been attending to business all the while as serenely as though he had never heard of a grand jury.

The Gumshoe Stampede

The only persons who appear to be eager these days to make what the police describe as a "get-away" are the men that were in the confidence of William J. Burns. Burns himself was in such a hurry to leave town that he neglected to say farewell to some of his dearest friends of the tenderloin. His departure resembled a panic, and the disintegration of his gumshoe brigade has been in the nature of a stampede. It is evident that what happened on election day filled with consternation the men that had been employed in conducting a reign of terror. Nearly all the gumshoe men have left town and no more trace behind than was left by Gallagher. What was it that caused the exodus? If Heney

Langdon's Perfervid Crew

Along with the stampede of the gumshoe brigade has been observed the change that has come over the spirit of the erstwhile zealous partisans who have been feeding at the public crib by virtue of Bill Langdon's political favor. All the assistant prosecuting attorneys have mended their manners since the election. They have become amiable and courteous. Not one of them is going around with a chip on his shoulder. Each appears to be trying to lose the reputation he acquired in the days when the whole office was afflicted with the Heney swagger. In those days when the limelight was playing on Langdon's joblot of legal talent each of his deputies was on the qui vive for an opportunity to insult opposing counsel. Then was it considered the proper thing in court to play the role of Bombastes Furioso, to give emphasis to argument by stiffening the sinews, summoning up the blood and disguising fair nature with hard-favored rage. It was in those days that young O'Gara, once upon a time a man of modest mien and Christian spirit, borrowed one of St. John's allusions to the Redeemer for the purpose of paying deference to Heney and giving offense to several distinguished representatives of the bar. Of course O'Gara and all his confreres are now contrite of spirit, and doubtless they would like to make amends. So it is to be hoped they will be forgiven and allowed to drift peacefully into oblivion.

Where Cohan Gathers Material

Those who attended the Marathon race last Sunday were afforded an opportunity of studying the manner in which George Cohan gathers material for his musical comedies. For the first time during his visit to this city the little wizard of Broadway emerged from retirement and during all the twenty-six miles of the big race his attention was never long distracted from the performance of his friend Johnny Hayes. In the meantime Cohan held levee surrounded by a retinue of sporting characters. Spider Kelly, Eddie Hanlon, Tim McGrath, Billy Jordan and others conversed with him and one might note with what a critical and appreciative eye he sized them up and filed them away in his mind for future use. We need not be surprised if Cohan, one of these days, sends us a play in which some of the famous bon mots of Tim McGrath or the choice argot of the Spider are preserved. That is the way Cohan has always worked.

The Prune Belt Philosopher

Up from the south at high noon bringing with him intact his fund of optimism and a few choice epigrams came Charley Shortridge, the perennial prophet of the prune belt, to enlighten the politicians of San Francisco with reference to his brand newest plan of action. Charley has been in penumbra for some time, but he has emerged as radiant as ever and like Halley's comet he threatens to cause some commotion in the world. No longer beholden to the machine that formerly had a monopoly of the manufacture of statesmen, Charley has resolved to go before the people at the primary election as a candidate for Attorney-General. "What the people need," says Charley, "is an Attorney-General sound in all his parts and I can produce a doctor's certificate. I am especially well developed in the backbone. I am guaranteed to stand upright in a storm. I never flounder. Besides I know some law. I know it because I used to make it. The office of Attorney-General is the most important office in the gift of the people, but the people don't know it. Being a particular friend of the people I'm going to take the job just to enlighten them. It's one of the fallacies of political philosophy that when reformers become enlightened they are transformed into practical politicians. The fact is it's the other way about, as you will see if you examine the personnel of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. I was for years a practical politician, but observe me now."

Such a Brave Soldier!

The Boughten Bulletin has been singing a requiem over the Rev. David J. Evans, who, though not dead, is preparing to go to sleep at Palo Alto. For the Rev. David J. Evans has resigned the rectorship of Grace Episcopal Church to settle down in the shadow of the Stanford University where, in academic groves he will no doubt cultivate the companionship of his favorite muse, that of poetry, for this distinguished divine is skilled in the language of impassioned feeling, and finds that the music of his own creation soothes his afflictions and multiplies and refines his enjoyments. But why should that perpetual fount of crocodile tears, the Boughten Bulletin, be weeping over the Rev. David J. Evans? The explanation is easy. Indeed it is disclosed by the Bulletin itself. He is "a brave soldier," says the Bulletin; "he sided with the graft prosecution from the beginning." Everybody that "sided with the graft prosecution" was "a brave soldier," but Dr. Evans was especially brave because he was the pastor of a church many communicants of which were not in sympathy with the cause which he had espoused. He gave offense to some of these communicants who ceased to attend Grace Church, but he went bravely on because he had to be true to himself, and because, as he explained according to the Bulletin, he could not go through all eternity despising his own soul. Such an awful outlook on eternity would certainly be enough to deter any man from being untrue to himself. Dr. Evans was loyal to self and incidentally to the graft prosecution, and now for an infinitesimal fraction of eternity he will be able to possess his soul with the raptures of warm admiration in the classic precincts of Palo Alto where the air is ever balmy and the sabbath stillness is never broken except by an occasional rebellion against Dave Jordan's iron rule.

The Impulsiveness of Him

The Boughten Bulletin intimates that Dr. Evans' resignation of the Grace Church rectorship was due to "difference of opinion between himself and certain vestrymen on the question of the graft prosecution." This intimation may not be far from the truth, but it does not necessarily follow, (as the thrifty journal that transmutes its morality into drachmas would have us believe), that by reason of Dr. Evans' resignation San Francisco has suffered a great loss. Dr. Evans may be a most sincere man and zealous clergyman, but he is not distinguished for soundness of judgment. When he espoused the cause of the graft prosecution it was because he mistook first impressions for deliberate opinions. Believing himself to be the civil arm of a spiritual power ordained to diffuse the efficacy of righteous indignation he ranged himself on the side of the notoriously corrupt Bulletin and its masters in ignorance of almost everything that he committed himself to. With motives of perhaps the highest sacramental virtue he permitted himself to be influenced by the clamor of the mob, and he ranked himself with certain representatives of the pulpit whose chief aim in life is to bask in the limelight, and who, to that end, are at all times at the beck and call of yellow journalists.

His Attitude Towards Crocker

In espousing the graft prosecution cause Dr. Evans doubtless gave offense to certain communicants of Grace Church, not because they were rich men and out of sympathy with movements for the promotion of civic decency, but because they knew what was being done by the cabal of canting hypocrites with which he had allied himself. One of the most prominent members of Grace Church in those days was William H. Crocker, a gentleman to whom the church was under many deep obligations. It was known almost from the beginning of the graft prosecution that one of the men by whom it was controlled had long been eager to revenge himself upon Mr. Crocker. The indictment of Mr. Crocker was one of the chief aims of the graft prosecution. That indictment his enemy sought to procure notwithstanding the fact that there was not a scintilla of evidence upon which it could be based. The conspiracy against Mr. Crocker was one of the most cruel of the many that were formed during the career of the prosecution cabal. Did Dr. Evans know of this conspiracy? Before deciding upon aiding and abetting the graft prosecution did he take the trouble to ask Mr. Crocker about the matters in which he knew that gentleman to be personally interested? Surely to have done so would not have been beneath his dignity; nor would it have been at all inconsistent with the character of a Christian clergyman who is supposed to be ever mindful of the injunction, Judge not lest ye be judged. In the circumstances the humblest member of the church would have been entitled to the sympathy and kindly offices of his pastor. In Mr. Crocker's case a sense of courtesy, if nothing else, should have moved Dr. Evans to make a few inquiries before assuming the role of archangel and with awful brow and flaming sword summoning us to do right and the divinely heroic.

The Crockers and Grace Church

Mr. Crocker, I am told, resigned from the vestry of Grace Church some months ago; whether on account of the part that Dr. Evans played through ignorance in the conspiracy to bring humiliation and dishonor upon him, I am not informed, but I will submit that in view of the rector's conduct, if he had remained in the church he would have given an exhibition of Christian forbearance even greater than that which Christ contemplated when he told his disciples that the eye-for-an-eye doctrine was out of date and that a blow on one cheek should be taken as the signal for turning the other. Mr. Crocker, it should be remembered, has been identified with Grace Church for many years. Long before any of the parishioners ever heard of the Rev. Evans members of the Crocker family were giving their financial support to Grace Church, and they were assisting in the good work that was being done under the auspices of the church. William Crocker's father and mother were among the most honored and respected members of the Church. When they died eloquent, heartfelt tributes were paid to their memory from the pulpit of Grace Church. There their funeral services were held. It was in Grace Church that Hattie Crocker and Charles Alexander were married. When San Francisco was ravished by fire and earthquake and most of our millionaires were tightening their purses and thinking of the Poor House, Mr. and Mrs. Will Crocker were thinking of Grace Church and to their sentments they gave expression by deeding to the church the whole block of land on Nob Hill which had once been the site of the Crocker homes. It was in a temporary church in that block, erected I believe by the Crockers, that the Rev. David Evans poured encomiums on the heads of men who were willing to fabricate evidence upon which to base a lying indictment against Will Crocker. But it was not from Grace Church that George Crocker was buried. That funeral took place from Trinity Church, and the funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Clampett, a clergyman who had the courage to scorn the importunities and covert threats of Fremont Older, the whipper-in of the graft prosecution. The day after George Crocker's funeral the Rev. David Evans proved that he was not devoid of good taste by sending in his resignation.

The Aftermath of the Charity Edition

William R. Hearst's local editors and business managers are beginning to realize that charitable endeavor is not always charitably construed and they are discovering a connection they knew not of between charity and the stern and uncompromising science of arithmetic. It all comes of the Thanksgiving edition of the Examiner which was written, edited and sold by the energetic women of the Associated Charities to replenish the funds of that worthy institution. The edition was a great success, judged either by the counting room or the editorial standard. The "stories" were cleverly written, the "make-up" was excellent and the pages fairly bulged with advertisements. Everybody remembers how the paper sold. It was a lovely success and the ladies of the Associated Charities were tickled to death with their achievement—until the day for settlement came. Then the troubles of the ladies and of the innumerable business managers began. When a statement of the receipts and disbursements was compiled the net result was not up to the expectations of the charity workers. They stated to the Examiner chiefs that they counted on receiving a larger sum and they objected to the statement of current Examiner expenses as being too high. I believe the Examiner estimates its daily expenses at $4,000, a truly formidable figure; but the figure for the special edition was much larger. The dispute has been acrimonious and has reached the stage where the ladies have flatly refused to accept the settlement offered by the Examiner, insisting that the edition brought in a great deal more than appears in the financial statement. Hearst is expected out here for the holidays and I am given to understand that the ladies will carry the matter straight to him. I would not be surprised if the Examiner men are beginning to feel sorry that they used a charitable cause for the financial aggrandizement of their paper. I know that the advertisers who cannot afford to withhold an advertisement when it is solicited in the name of charity, will be mighty glad if the dispute puts an end to the special charity edition scheme.

A Notable Phalanx

Last Monday night the Examiner marshaled, in the language of one of its headline writers, a "solid phalanx to fight for Geary street bonds." A solid phalanx of what, whether of hoplites or Macedonian infantry or vociferous demagogues, the headline writer sayeth not. It is deemed sufficient for those who glean the news of the day from headlines only that the phalanx is armed to the teeth with double-barreled enthusiasm of the on-to-victory kind. For information as to the nature of the phalanx one must read on and discover the personnel of the latest patriotic movement in civic affairs. One of the first names that the eye falls upon is that of E. A. Wolcott, a novelist, whose training as a writer of sensational fiction was obtained in the editorial rooms of the Examiner office. Then comes M. C. Hassett, familiarly known among his admirers as Michael Catholic Hassett, current President of the Iroquois Club, an organization devoted to the promotion of the benign interests of eternal job-chasers. Shoulder to shoulder with Hassett, and on the good right hand of Wolcott looms the swart figure of Max Popper, ex-partner of that retired civic patriot Chris Buckley. In the forefront Richard Cornelius bobs up serenely, the same Cornelius that precipitated the memorable car strike and that was rewarded with a job by the good Mayor Taylor. Alongside of Cornelius we find Charley Sweigert, the zealous police commissioner who hopes to go to Fremont Older when he dies; also, Charles Wesley Reed, whose hobby is cheap water because he still has that flock of thirsty mules that he hypothecated to the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company; also, E. P. E. Troy, the greatest reformer of his weight and inches in all the wide world; also, Phelan's supervisor, D. C. Murphy, and last but not least, little Eustace Cullinan, a specimen product of the Bulletin office. A solid phalanx indeed! Where can you beat it for patriotic self-sacrifice, for impassioned love of the dear pee-pul, for the public service that signifies a private snap? There should be nothing indefinite in the description of this phalanx. It is a phalanx of horrendous heroes in the eternal strife that is being waged for the redemption of the unregenerate, a phalanx whose resolutions have all the efficacy that was embodied in those of the three immortal tailors of Tooley street. By this phalanx it has been resolved that we must have a taxpayers' railroad on Geary street, and that ought to settle the matter. Such heavy taxpayers as E. P. E. Troy and Dan Murphy and M. C. Hassett and Author Wolcott have determined that the cost of the road is a matter of no significance; nor in their opinion should anybody stop to consider the folly of the project from the standpoint of practical service. All that we should consider at this time are ways and means of

Edgar Saltus on California

If the Portola fiesta did nothing more for us it was amply justified in this that it showed us to Edgar Saltus at our very best. When the Saltus dry point is exercised on personalities or places, those personalities or places are etched into more enduring fame, for nearly everything that Saltus writes is of literary importance. Even the jewels that he drops into newspaper columns will be gathered up some day and set in books which will display their brilliance to the best advantage. Saltus has been discoursing of California in one of his recent essays, and as he was in this city no longer ago than the occasion of our big celebration, his words may be interpreted in connection with that memorable affair. According to Saltus the only American plays worth while are "those of the West as seen from California." Here is a statement which may well cause all our local playwrights—and there are more of them than you imagine—to pluck up heart of grace. But Saltus continues: "The mere name is evocative. It ushers—when it is not raining—a streaming sun, a stream of gold and glittering girls, the caresses of all, their cajolements, sensations and situations." It is quite evident that when Saltus writes of California he has San Francisco in mind. The reference to "glittering girls" would not fit Los Angeles. The whole passage is eloquent of Saltus' enjoyment of the Portola celebration. Enjoy it he did, as anybody can tell you who had the pleasure of his company during his stay here. In fact he enjoyed it as one to the local manner born and is worthy, in my opinion, of being reckoned a San Franciscan by adoption.

The Jealousy of Los Angeles

From Charles C. Moore I learn that the energetic gentlemen who are promoting the plan for a world's fair in this city on the completion of the Panama Canal are meeting with obstinate opposition from the people of Los Angeles. It seems that the southern city wants to have the fair either in Los Angeles itself or in San Diego and that it will not accede to the proposition of celebrating the opening of the great waterway in the only city which anybody has so far thought of as the fitting place for such an affair. Of course it is nothing new for Los Angeles to be jealous of San Francisco, but this happens to be a peculiarly aggravated case because unless the representatives of the whole State pull together, there will be trouble about getting an appropriation from Congress. I understand that a delegation of local men will soon leave for Los Angeles to try their skill at bringing the refractory southerners to a reasonable view of the situation. I will venture to assert that if the Los Angeles people put obstacles in the way of holding the fair here, it will not be held in this State at all. New Orleans would like nothing better than to entertain the world on the occasion of the opening of the canal.

The Sweet Soul of Le Gallienne

Those who read the various diatribes which Richard Le Gallienne leveled at William Watson in the expiring controversy about the wife and daughter of the British prime minister may have suspected that the publicist was actuated by motives not wholly pure. I do not mean to insinuate that the diatribes were contributed to the Hearst papers at so much per diatribe; but it has doubtless occurred to many that Le Gallienne exhibited an excess of chivalry at the expense of an adversary already self-tumbled in the dust of the lists. A man who flourishes his little pen with loud vociferations and spills such an intolerable deal of ink that all other ink-spillers are constrained to give him a monopoly of the quarrel is apt to be charged with other motives than the prompting of quixotic courage. I cannot say what spite Le Gallienne was venting when he thus attacked unhappy William Watson, but I have a shrewd notion that it was a case of spitefulness just the same. Why? Because I have just found another reason for believing Le Gallienne a spiteful man. It comes to me in the shape of a signed criticism written by Le Gallienne for The New York Times on the latest book of Arthur Symons, "The Romantic Movement in English Poetry." If this article was not conceived in a most spiteful humor and written with a pen of wormwood I confess myself incapable of reading the meaning of plain English. And if it is spiteful I leave it to the reader to tell himself just what sort of a sweet-scented epicene creature Richard Le Gallienne is. All who have facilities for following the trend of events among British literary men know into what an unhappy condition Arthur Symons has been plunged; consequently they can appreciate the depth of malice from which Le Gallienne strikes at him in defiance, not only of truth and justice, but even of common pity.

What He Has To Say of Symons

Le Gallienne begins his critique of Symons' book by stating that Symons was the disciple of Walter Pater and that he has made it his study to carry out Pater's formula of the function of an esthetic critic. Symons has applied this formula, he says, "with a narrow thoroughness impossible for Pater, with his richness of temperament and his colored humanity. Pater was a poet who fondly dreamed he was a critic, Mr. Symons is a critic who fondly dreams he is a poet." Le Gallienne then goes on to tell us a thing which he has no means of knowing to be true, that Pater threw off his critical formula in a moment of fanciful carelessness. Then he pleasantly elaborates the pains which Symons has been at to follow this carelessly thrown off formula during years of critical endeavor. This would be a remarkable instance of the master setting up an ignis fatuus for the disciple's everlasting confusion if there were the least truth in it, but there is not. Even so Le Gallienne admits that Symons has achieved some success in his critical work but the concession is only made in order that he may pretend to praise the work of "this man who never seems to have had a dream of his own—this man who never seems to have felt a kindly human emotion." And then by deliberate misinterpretation of Symons' words he arrives at the conclusion that the only love of which Symons knows is sexual love. It follows, to the satisfaction of Le Gallienne, that Symons does not love literature and we have this splenetic outburst: "The really great critic . . . loves literature. . . . He does not sit up as a pert, lightweight Rhadamanthus, with a shrill cockney accent, pronouncing a glib doom on this poet and on that." Then Le Gallienne finds himself driven to a theological explanation of Symons' criticisms. "They are of the Devil." Finally Le Gallienne laments that the "taint of the superior person" mars all that Symons writes.

What Others Have Thought

Such utterances are so effectually condemned by their own evident malice that it may seem the work of supererogation to point out that men for whom Le Gallienne would not be worthy to perform menial service have acclaimed Symons an incomparable critic. When Symons published his "Introduction to the Study of Browning," a book which has done more for that great poet than all the journals of all the Browning societies, he won the applause of Walter Pater and George Meredith, but best of all, he had these words from Browning himself: "It does indeed strike me as wonderful that you should have given such patient attention to all those poems and (if I dare say further), so thoroughly entered into, at any rate, the spirit in which they were written and the purpose they hoped to serve." In our own country James Huneker has spoken of Symons thus: "In the vast and shrill concert of contemporary polemics the voice of Arthur Symons is the 'still small' one. It is easily distinguishable because of its timbre, like that of some rich-toned violin." As for Symons' poetical achievement, it is not of the highest, but in delicacy of thought and in mastery of rhythmical expression it is beyond anything Richard Le Gallienne may ever hope to do. The difference lies in this that Symons is a genius while Le Gallienne is not. Many of Symons' poems have been published in this paper from time to time, but the following little lyric may serve to indicate some of the qualities of his verse:

The night's held breath,
  And the star's steady eyes;
Is it sleep, is it death,
  In the earth, in the skies?

In my heart of hope,
  In my restless will,
There is that should not stop
  Though the earth stood still,
Though the heavens shook, aghast,
  As the frost shakes a tree,
And a strong wind cast
  The stars in the sea.

King Leopold as a Penitent

The world is pretty well agreed as to the extreme necessity of penitence in the case of King Leopold of Belguim. The old king has many sins to answer for, if we may believe even a tithe of the stories told about him. Once before two continents were edified by the news that he had become repentant. That was in 1902, about the time that a crazy anarchist made an attempt upon his life. It is likely that the aged king did not continue long in sackcloth and ashes. Perhaps if Leopold had sincerely intended to mend his ways he would have removed the snowy beard of which he has always been inordinately vain and which is so familiar to the habitues of the music halls and green rooms of Paris. Leopold's beard flows to his waist and it is said that he is so fond of it that every night his valet ties it up in a bag of pale blue silk in order to preserve its luster and to prevent the hairs from tangling. most notorious of the demi-mondaines of Paris have toyed with the remarkable hirsute appendage of this royal rake. His amours with Cleo de Merode and Liane de Pougy have been the mock of Europe for years, but more sinister by far have been the transgressions which he has committed against his own family.

Herbert Roth to Marry

I hear that young Herbert Roth, the cartoonist, is soon to marry. This very talented chap went abroad with his mother nearly a year ago and when last heard from was exploring out of the way places in Hungary. I understand that the young lady of Roth's choice is a native of this city but that they will be united in Europe, it being the intention of the bride-to-be to go abroad very soon. Roth's plans do not include a return to the newspaper field of this city. He has had the offer of a splendid position on one of the big New York dailies and will undoubtedly accept it when he has finished his wanderyear and honeymoon. When Roth was on the Bulletin the discerning marked him as one of the most promising cartoonists in the country and it now looks as though the prediction is about to be fulfilled.

Why Tom Boyd Blushes

Thomas P. Boyd, the popular district attorney of Marin County, has recently developed a degree of bashfulness which would do credit to a stammering schoolboy. Let two of Boyd's friends pass him on the street in San Rafael and they have but to exchange a knowing look or a nudge and Tom breaks into a ruddy glow of unmistakable confusion. As for the ladies—well, Tom Boyd is not fond of feminine society just now. It all came of a fire in the Boyd kitchen a few nights ago. A careless housemaid, just before retiring, threw a match into the woodbox and in a few minutes the slumbering household was awakened by cries of "fire." Not only was the household awakened but the whole neighborhood and a number of men, women and children came pattering into the Boyd home to lend their assistance. When they reached the kitchen door they took one look and gasped. Tom Boyd had rushed amid the flames in his pajamas and after he had used all the towels that were handy in his attempt to smother the flames, had divested himself of his scanty covering and was extinguishing the last spark with his sleeping attire. Boyd fled somewhere to escape the eyes of the onlookers—to the attic, some say—but at any rate he hasn't the nerve to look his friends in the face these days, for the story simply galloped through San Rafael.

Japanese Decreasing in Hawaii

For many obvious reasons the people of this State are more than sentimentally interested in Hawaiian affairs, and it is therefore remarkable that our daily papers devote so little space to news of the industrial development of the islands. When Governor Frear of Hawaii recently came to this country on his way to Washington the dailies might have obtained some important and interesting news from him, but evidently they did not think it worth while. The impression prevails in this State that all the good things in the islands are rapidly falling into the hands of the Japanese who are constantly increasing in numbers. From Governor Frear I learn that as a matter of fact the Japanese are rapidly diminishing in numbers. By reason of the arrangement between Japan and the United States immigration from Japan has ceased and now departures are twice as many as arrivals. "We are taking a great deal of interest in immigration just now," says Governor Frear. "We are endeavoring to get immigrants that will not only make good laborers but good citizens as well. We have obtained some from the mainland, but they come in very slowly, and we have had some from Europe. Just now we are experimenting with European Siberians, that is Europeans who have settled in Siberia. About two months ago we brought over a lot of 230 men, women and children, and so far we are pretty well satisfied with them. They are large, strong and intelligent, and as the men have brought their families with them they are contented on the plantations. We are now arranging to bring others. We get them from the regions about Harbin, bring them to Japan via Dalny and ship them thence on a Pacific Mail steamer. This work is being conducted by the Territorial government through its board of immigration. We pay their passage, but there is no contract. Large numbers of them in Siberia are anxious to come into Hawaii. It is simply a question of raising the money to pay their passage and to keep out the undesirable. We have them examined before they leave Dalny. It costs about $70 apiece to get them to Honolulu, but we hope to get the price reduced to $50 a head. The money for this purpose is raised by a special tax on incomes of over $4,000 a year. The rate is 2 per cent, and it yields about $400,000 a year. Of this three-fourths is applied to immigration purposes and the remainder to the conservation of our natural resources. This is in addition to the regular tax on incomes, which is 2 per cent, and applies to all incomes of $1,500 a year and more.

Industrial Development

Hawaii has been very prosperous for two years, Governor Frear reports. The sugar crop is good and prices high. But planters are no longer devoting all their attention to sugar. They are developing other crops. They are branching out into cotton, tobacco, rubber and siral and the outlook for these products is very good. Furthermore the people are contented and are not clamoring for Statehood. Nor have the native Hawaiians, who control two-thirds of the vote and who have a majority in the Legislature, any desire for a return of monarchial government.

The Cavortings of the Gridironers

Every year the funnymen of the Washington press are turned loose to chronicle the doings of the Gridiron Club, as the association of Washington correspondents is called. There is a sort of tradition that the incidents of these annual meetings shall not be made public but so far as anybody can discover this tradition is honored in the breach only. Perhaps, as the Gridiron Club is not so much a club as a designation for annual gatherings of the newspapermen and their guests, the etiquette of these affairs has not been very accurately settled. At any rate there is a widespread belief that these Gridiron dinners are redolent of rare humor and electric with novel wit—that all the unspoiled merriment of the capital is let loose to make a journalistic holiday. I have never been able to find much justification for this belief. Take the dinner which was held about a week ago. There were the usual topical allusions to the polar controversy, to Roosevelt's hunting trip, to Taft's perplexities and so on, but as far as any quality of delicacy or subtlety was concerned, it was conspicuous by its absence. Perhaps the newspapermen are too busy to prepare for the function in any but a haphazard, hit-or-miss fashion; but I am willing to wager that the gentlemen of the Press Club in this city can, on just as short notice, give an entertainment which will compare favorably with any of the Gridiron affairs.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy.

Stocks—Nothing has developed in the Wall street situation in recent weeks worthy of serious comment. Prices of stocks have been maintained by bankers who bought the leading railway specialties. However, no effort has been apparent to warrant the belief that bankers were willing to see any bull speculation at the moment, a slow advance being more desirable at this time. The subject of labor agitation continues to be somewhat of a menace to the future but this matter will not be of serious consequence until after the first of the new year and then this momentous question will undoubtedly be threshed out satisfactorily to those concerned. The lowering of the English bank rate to 4½ per cent is indicative of cheaper money both abroad and here and will eventually be a factor for higher security values. We believe that securities will work higher over the first of the new year.

Wheat prices are looking higher and no material reaction need be expected. The switchmen's strike has reduced the available supply of spring wheat and it will take a month to build up a fair surplus for Minneapolis mills alone. The winter wheat region has been swept cleaner of farm surplus than a year ago. There will be a hand to mouth existence in the milling trade of this country all winter. The European situation is fair at present. Argentina will not have a crop in excess of last year and this will be a constant bullish factor. The outlook for next year's crop will not be a factor before March. The condition was near perfect, but this was forecasted. The years of large acreage and fine condition in December gave the smallest yields. We anticipate a final estimate of wheat next week around 750,000,000 bushels, perhaps the largest on record. We believe the crop to be worse overestimated than in the past two years. The market should break on this report but should be bought on the break as supplies in sight, not estimated yields, make a market.

Corn is passing through the crucial period of December on a big advance. Th cold weather in the big belt and the small receipts have created alarm. St. Louis sold No. 3 corn this week at 65 against 57 for the same quality at Chicago. Kansas City is higher than Chicago. The Iowa State report says one-third of the crop is rotten and unfit for use. The estimate for the State is 34 million under the Government. Yet with all 'this the Government's final report is apt to give a larger crop than the preliminary estimate. It does look as if the Government Bureau is attempting to reduce prices by making fictitious yields. The wise men will buy May corn on any reaction. It is worth 85 cents on the farm for feeding.

Cotton—The Government report of 10,088,000 bales of 500 pounds gross indicates a crop of but little in excess of 9,700,000 bales when it is considered that about 20 pounds should be deducted from each bale for bagging and ties. To these figures should be added about 297,000 bales for linters and repacks which would mean a commercial crop of about 9,997,000 bales which is easily the most bullish crop estimate ever issued by the department. We consider the conditions full justify the small estimate and believe that it will take an enormous early movement from the new crop next August for the crop to reach the 10,000,000 bale mark. The situation on a basis of supply and demand is therefore favorable to higher prices, especially as regards September and October of the new crop. Liquidation will cause natural reactions from time to time and on such reactions we advise buying, as present prices do not nearly discount conditions.

Copper Stocks—Copper stock prices have shown fair sized variations for the past week or so, moving up and down with the rumors concerning the copper merger. As for the metal itself, the most important development in this department is the larger domestic consumption. Returns from manufacturers indicate that the smelting in this country in November was close to 60,000,000 pounds and that the electrical industry including the wire drawers have experienced the heaviest month of the calendar year. A more significant fact, even, is that the orders for the manufactured material for future delivery have been greater, the demand being stimulated during the period of advancing prices, and it is estimated that new business for the manufactured material was placed in November, aggregating between 65,000,000 and 75,000,000 pounds. Copper metal exports, however, are largely in excess of foreign consumption, which is evident from the fact that there was an increase of 14,000,000 pounds in the warehouse stocks of Great Britain and France last month. Concerning the copper merger, it is said that the plans for its consumption are gradually being drawn up and that some sort of an announcement dealing with the progress that is being made will be issued between now and the first of the year. Negotiations are said to be under way for the acquisition of the Miami by the Cole-Ryan interests. It is understood that the asking price is $25 per share of 100,000 shares. Butte Coalition is enlarging the Rarus air shaft and will sink both the tramway and the Rarus to greater depths. General conditions on the Copper Range Company's Champion mine are reported better, between 70,000 and 75,000 tons of rock being shipped each month. Shannon's shipments in November were 1,400,000 pounds of copper. It is understood that the Lake Copper Company will begin regular shipments of ore to the mill shortly. For the purpose, it is presumed, of getting the assets of the various subsidiary companies of the Amalgamated Copper Company under a capitialization more nearly representative of their actual value, preparatory to the completion of the copper merger, some of them are to be reorganized. That it is the intention of the Amalgamated directors to confine the company to mining and the allied industries is disclosed by the fact that all the mercantile interests have been disposed of. Because of the favorable outlook in the United States and the effect of the switchmen's strike on the smelting operations in the West, it seems probable that a renewal of speculative interest will be shown in copper stocks in the near future and that a reaction from the recent lower prices will follow the heavier operations. There is also a disposition to credit the more favorable report received in regard to the contemplated consolidation of copper properties. Purchases of Amalgamated, Anaconda, Butte Coalition, Giroux, Miami, Nevada Consolidated, North Butte, Ray Consolidated and Utah Copper look to be the most advisable.

Local Securities—The local market for stocks and bonds continues to be quite active and, taking the list as a whole, a rather healthy tone prevails. Alaska Packers shares have lately become very popular and have made a new high record. As the annual meeting of the Association approaches, the talk of dividends on this stock becomes more generally believed. Associated Oil, after passing through a small decline, recovered very sharply in the early part of the week and has since presented a firmer front. Spring Valley Water continues to be influenced by rumors concerning the probable result of the coming special election but it seems that the "red-fire" has temporarily gone out of it. Sugar stocks are more quiet and somewhat irregular. Hawaiian Commercial, Honokaa, Makaweli, Onomea and Union are all firm, with Hutchinson and Paauhau slightly weaker. Pacific Telephone stocks are not attracting much attention and they, and the Pacific Gas and Electric stocks, have been temporarily put on the shelf. Firemens Fund stock is very strong and has lately sold at its highest price since the fire of 1906. The shares of the North Alaska Salmon Company were recently listed on the Exchange and their quotation has increased from 101 to 107½ bid. This company owns salmon canneries in the North and pays 9 per cent in dividends. It is said that the surplus of the North Alaska Salmon Company is now sufficient to maintain a 9 per cent dividend rate for a number of years. Dealings in bonds have fallen off slightly, the main activity being in Associated Oil 5s, City Electric 5s, Oakland Transit Con. 5s, Pacific Electric 5s, People's Water 5s, Spring Valley Water 4s and United Railroads 4s. It is said that Alaska Packers will see 95 before the end of next January, that North Alaska Salmon will be advanced to around 120 and that Associated Oil will make a new record, on this move, at no remote date. Spring Valley continues to be picked up by brokers who are known to be buying for the inside.

The Anonymous Dance

The No-name ball at the St. Francis Friday night has passed into history and left society still struggling with its anonymity. Among the variety of designations the St. Francis ball seems to be favored when it is under discussion. It is necessary to call it something, even though a dancing club, according to the latest cry in the East, must be nameless. This somewhat puzzling innovation is probably a reaction from the elaborate effects of the "Rose Leaf Social Clubs" and the "Bon Ame Cotillons." One of the interesting diversions of the evening was the reception by Minister Chang and his suite in the tapestry room of the St. Francis to prominent Chinese of this city. The guests at the ball left their dancing to watch the Orientals in their gorgeous brocades, and they in turn seemed quite as interested in the lovely frocks of the fair Americans. Among the most effective costumes worn was that of Mrs. Walter Martin who first evolved the idea of the subscription dances. Her gown was of old blue silk with a tunic over-dress of thin black lace, and her jewels were sapphires and diamonds.

Greenway Was Absent

The absence of Ned Greenway from the ball has been much commented upon. By accident or design the former lone leader of society was out of town, as far away as Seattle, which made it impossible for him to grace the debut of a rival with his presence. Mr. Greenway, however, had received an invitation to the ball, and the most cordial relations are said to exist between him and Mrs. Martin and all the twenty-four patronesses. But the fact remains that Mr. Greenway was not at the ball, and that his absence from the city covered only a few days.

Luncheon in Fairyland

Prodigal San Francisco society women will have to do a great deal to surpass the records made during the past week. The luncheon given yesterday at the Palace, when Mrs. Florence Porter Pfingst entertained some two hundred and more of her friends, made many an experienced pair of eyes grow big and round with wonder and admiration. The ball room was a fairy vision of glitter and sparkle, a small forest of tinsel-bedecked Christmas trees with a big pine standing in the center of every one of the fifteen tables where the guests were seated. Each tree had gifts for the guests, but these were not taken down until the conclusion of the luncheon. Fancy the eagerness. It was like a lot of kiddies awaiting the coming of Santa Claus. Then toward the end of the luncheon, a pretty surprise delighted the guests when a choir of white robed altar boys, chanting Christmas hymns, came winding in and out among the tables, as an organ in the distance gave forth the sweet strains of old carols. Mrs. Pfingst who is certainly a diplomat, had all her friends seated in such a way that every coterie was by itself, and naturally, everyone was delighted. There was one table where the buds sat, with pretty Anna Peters and Amy Bowles as the hostesses. At another table Mrs. William T. Sesnon and Mrs. C. C. Moore presided. Others who had tables, assisting Mrs. Pfingst at her luncheon, were Mrs. Charles Deering, Mrs. Alden Anderson, Miss Ardella Mills, Mrs. Francis Lucas, Mrs. Horace Wilson, Mrs. Danforth, Mrs. W. W. Fennimore and Mrs. John T. Porter.

The Rift Within the Lute

Should the Hebrew members of the San Francisco Musical Club resign in a body, that, of itself, would scarcely make the music mute, but merely minus the wonderful "Jewish timbre" that in the past has given it no little distinction. Had the club never thus ungrammatically written by the hand of the ex-chairman of its Admission Committee: "The Club has nearly reached its limit as far as the hall will accommodate and they felt the restrictions should be made with Jewish applicants, as the Club is primarily a Gentile Club," it might now be pursuing the even tenor, or rather, soprano, of its way, instead of shouting itself hoarse in flat explanations, fearing to face its own music. Had it never fiddled thus off-key: "Your name will be placed on a waiting list and when a vacancy occurs by the resignation of a Jewish member, you may succeed as a member," it might now be at play instead of at its wit's end how without loss of dignity and prestige to pay the piper. Had it never made the following vulgarly invidious ruling: "Moved and seconded that the list for Jewish Associate Members be closed and any future applicants must await a vacancy in their waiting list," it might now be seated elsewhere than at the organ, weary of its own voice and ill at ease by reason of the noise raised. How its "dodgers" do dodge!—must needs, even as civilization, devil-driven, of necessity civilizes! Then it was: "Later on it will be necessary to restrict the Gentile applicants too." Now, according to the dodger, "It is the decision of the Board of Directors that the Roll of Associate Members, Jew and Gentile, should for the present be closed, the membership having attained such numbers, that further increase is not desirable." Nor, having attained such notoriety, is further increase desirable! Eh! Honorable, unbiased Board, whose action in this questionable matter, "like its other transactions, was executive, and not intended for publication." I should say not! Well, the best laid plans of—shall we say mice!

The Club's Unhappy Plight

If civilization civilizes, dodgers dodge, surely explanations must needs explain, nor fall flat! How can they help themselves? Musically speaking, nothing is more natural than that sharp practice should be taught the lesson it stands in need of, get the toning down that is truly desirable. The authorized-version voice of the Board is woodeny, wobbly, nor bridges the difficulty. It hints a thistley tongue and great ears, but not for music. Unmusically speaking, the devil, being tolerant, is not as black as he's painted. 'Tis intolerance that is absolute pitch! Unluckily for the San Francisco Musical Club, there are on its active list—the list of the musically able—thirteen Hebrew members and but one on its associate and larger list; the proportion of active to associate members being about as 118 is to 262. Moreover, the musical director of the Club's Choral Section is a Hebrew and, incidentally, the most competent and caustic musical critic in San Francisco. Of what race is Elman? Bauer? Levinne? and the matchless rest? Whose compositions do they play? Whose money makes their concerts possible in this musical West? Our impresario—were he woman, would he (or she) not have to wait for one of his (or her) people to resign in order to become an associate member of the primarily Gentile, not primarily musical, club aforesaid? Could the force of folly further go?

Mrs. Welch's Bridge Party

Chic little Mrs. Andrew Welch who always reminds me of a Tanagra figure bewitched to animation by some wonder-worker, has outstripped all the other women in the attempt to surprise by originality. Originality seems as easy to Mrs. Welch as the commonplace does to the average woman. I presume that is an inheritance from her Latin ancestry. She has given the largest bridge party of the winter so far, decorating her rooms with little Billikin gods. The squat grinning chap at whose shrine folks are learning the doctrine of common sense, reigned that afternoon over a charming throng of card devotees. The consolation prize was a wee gold Billikin that was awarded to Mrs. Grayson Dutton who is one of the few among the younger matrons who says that she will not learn bridge for fear of its fascination. But the Billikin may change her mind. All of the old experts were there, carrying away gorgeous prizes so easily that a lot of the beginners declare that they hate to compete with such women as Mrs. H. M. A. Miller, Mrs. Frank Deering, Mrs. Alexander Garceau, Mrs. Henry Foster Dutton, Mrs. Mountford Wilson and the rest of the invincibles. Never was there such sharp, spirited playing, for everyone knew that the prizes would be worth while owning. One of the women mentioned above has such a number of bridge trophies that her boudoir is crowded with costly knick-knacks and they overflow into other rooms.

Miss Josselyn's Secret

Miss Mary Josselyn seems to be unusually happy these days and as her pleasant state of mind can hardly be attributed to the weather or any other prosaic cause, all her friends are looking for the man in the case. Some think it is the young Italian chap who is so often seen in her company, but I am inclined to the opinion that they are on the wrong track, for I know of a certain wealthy bachelor, regarded as one of the confirmed variety, who is cherishing a very tender feeling for this charming young lady. If this surmise is correct there will be general surprise, for this bachelor has been the despair of managing mamas for many years.

Nickelodeon Parties

Our social pets, ever on the alert for a new pastime to banish languor and stiffle yawns, have suddenly come to realize what thousands with no aspirations toward exclusiveness have known for many a long day, namely, that the nickelodeons afford an excellent variety of entertainment. So it is all the fad right now for our gilded fashionables to go in parties from one nickelodeon to another until half a dozen have been visited; then a supper at one of the cafes rounds out the evening. Of course our aristocrats who condescend to mingle with the vulgar herd at these places of five cent entertainment take every care to avoid the contamination of too close contact with the unwashed. In the first place a discreet chaperon makes the rounds, selecting only such nickelodeons for her list as exhibit nothing to wound the susceptibilities of our sensitive elite. Then the belles and beaux take care to so dress themselves that they may not be mistaken for members of the middle class. It is true that they sometimes dispense with their motor cars, but blue blood may be traced even in one's manner of threading the crowds on a thoroughfare like Fillmore or Market street, and by loud talking, an air of boredom and indifference to the stage one may make it plain that one is high bred and "in society." So the nickelodeon fad is quite a popular one with our exclusives and may be counted on to last ever so long—say, from the blooming to the fading of an orchid.

Wedding Comes as a Surprise

The wedding of Miss Winifred M. Pollock, daughter of Lieutenant Colonel and Mrs. O. W. Pollock, to Lieutenant John C. Fairfax, U. S. A., was a very quiet affair. The ceremony was performed at the home of the bride's parents in Ashbury street on Tuesday, December 9, Rev. William Edward Hayes of All Saints Episcopal Church officiating. This quiet simple notice has caused more talk over the tea cups than any of the large and brilliant weddings within the last year. All of Miss Pollock's friends had received invitations to her wedding which was to have taken place on October 19, the day of the opening of the Portola festival, but the groom was to have been, not Lieutenant Fairfax but a Mr. Long of Mexico. A few days before the wedding friends were surprised to receive delicate little notes from the prospective bride announcing that owing to sickness in the family, the wedding would be postponed indefinitely. No other explanation came until a few days ago when the new romance became known. Mrs. Fairfax is the granddaughter of the late Robert R. Thompson, the millionaire. Her mother was Miss Sallie Thompson, a sister of Mrs. Ivy L. Borden, formerly Miss Dixie Thompson of this city. Lieutenant Fairfax is a handsome young officer and a general favorite in the army. Upon the return of the young couple from their wedding tour they will reside on Angel Island.

Mrs. Atherton's Conversion

The sudden conversion of Gertrude Atherton to the cause of woman's suffrage came as a great surprise to her friends in this city and can only be attributed to the wonderful powers of persuasiveness possessed by Mrs. Clarence Mackay. In an interview given to one of the New York papers Mrs. Atherton stated quite frankly that it was at the request of Mrs. Mackay that she had become a member of the New York league for the advancement of the suffrage cause. Certainly her name is a valuable one for the suffragists to list in the roll of their champions, for Mrs. Atherton is capable of doing great things for the propaganda both in this country and England. But those who read an article contributed by Mrs. Atherton to a recent number of a well-known woman's periodical may well be astonished at her swift change of heart. In that article Mrs. Atherton said: "Personally I hate the sight and sound of a suffragist" and she added that the movement in favor of woman's suffrage was merely a detail of feminine progress, a declaration which did not betray a great deal of sympathy for the work in which Mrs. Mackay was so actively engaged. But of course there are suffragists and suffragists and no doubt Mrs. Mackay has as little regard as her famous convert for the vociferous sort.

Fritzi's Woolen Wedding

Mr. and Mrs. John Fox Jr. celebrated their woolen wedding with a supper party at the St. Francis Monday night. Mrs. Fox is fascinating Fritzi Scheff and Mr. Fox is the same John Fox Jr. who wrote "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine" and other well known novels. Their marriage last year was one of the keenest sensations of the sort literary and dramatic New York has known. The first anniversary of this interesting event fell on Monday and a "woolen" party was given to celebrate. Among the gifts was an absurd collection of wool dolls sent by Richard Harding Davis. Peter Martin brought a wooly lamb as his offering. When she made her first appearance here with the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company Fritzi Scheff was the wife of an Austrian army officer whom she divorced two years ago. Miss Scheff is one of society's favorites. On her last visit she was the belle of a Greenway assembly, proving quite as irresistable in the ball-room as she is on the stage. The friends she made then have been doing much for her entertainment in the past week.

The Durkin-Fealy Nuptials

Until a press despatch from Denver announced the other day that Maude Fealy had married James Durkin, most of us had lost track of that extremely temperamental actor who used to be the leading man at the Alcazar. It will be recalled that one day Durkin who looked more like a clergyman than a leading man, startled the town by eloping with pretty little Frances Starr who was then the ingenue at the Alcazar. Durkin and little Fanny went East and had a hard time of it for awhile. But Frances Starr who had been a great hit here justified those who had painted a glowing future for her by landing in Broadway as the star of "The Rose of the Rancho." Durkin has been playing in stock companies ever since. The wife whom he left behind when he levanted with Frances Starr secured a divorce. Maude Fealy also was divorced some time ago, her marital affairs receiving considerable exploitation in the papers, owing to her mother's alleged interference between the young actress and her husband who was a Denver newspaperman.

The Best Exhibition

The annual exhibition of Best's Art School opened Thursday afternoon at the studio, 1628 Bush street. There was a goodly number of art-lovers in attendance, both in the afternoon and evening. Those who have not yet visited the exhibition will have their last opportunity today. There are many works well worthy of study including a number of canvases of the Bests themselves. In addition to these are the studies of the pupils in oils, water colors, pastel and black and white, many of them indicating unusual powers of workmanship.

Golfers Eager to Beat Tubbs' Score

Last September Chapin F. Tubbs, one of the younger golf players of California, went around the 18 holes of the Hotel Del Monte course in 63 wonderful strokes, beating all previous amateur and professional records and setting a new score for this famous course upon which nearly every golf player of note in this country has played at sometime or other. This was one of the sensational features of the annual tournament, and so insistent has been the demand that the management has decided to have another tournament over the New Year's holiday. The play will start Friday, December 31, and end on New Year's day, giving all day Sunday for resting up. There will be a handicap competition for men and a similar event for women—qualifying rounds over eighteen holes, medal play, will be held on Friday morning, beginning at 9:30, eight to qualify in each event. The first match rounds will be played on Friday afternoon; the semi-final match rounds on Saturday morning and the final match rounds on Saturday afternoon,—all rounds being over eighteen holes. It is also hinted that some of the well known San Francisco players who have been playing in excellent form for the past few months now feel able for the task and are going to try to equal or beat Tubbs' score. As a great many society folk are planning to spend the Christmas and New Year's holidays at Del Monte the tournament will provide a delightful diversion and will be of great interest to the spectators, as well as their friends. The Del Monte links are in perfect condition, making play there particularly delightful.

Violet Asquith as a Stump Speaker

Miss Violet Asquith who, with her mother, furnished the inspiration for William Watson's notorious "Woman with the Serpent's Tongue," has taken the platform as an advocate of the government over which her father presides. Miss Asquith has never before taken a hand in politics and her appearance made a great sensation. The occasion was the opening of a bazaar in Hammersmith, one of those charitable functions which are made to serve the ends of politics in Great Britain much more frequently than in this country. Miss Asquith's speech is said to have been of the red hot variety and if the young lady bore in mind the many criticisms which have been leveled at her pretty head since Watson made his astounding statements in New York, she was probably spurred to unusual efforts. The indications are that Miss Asquith will continue to occupy the hustings during the desperate campaign which is now in progress.

Sierra Folks

By a Sierran

It is getting to be so much "the thing" nowadays to spend a few days at the Hotel del Portal and then go on to Yosemite that two of us decided we would not be left behind. Our experiences were so novel and delightful that it seems only fair to let others know of them.

The morning train brought us to Merced about two o'clock, with a stop for lunch on the way. From there we traveled for four hours on the Yosemite Valley Railroad along the banks of the beautiful Merced River. I have found that many people who have visited Yosemite in former years have never been via Merced and therefore are unfamiliar with this picturesque route.

The Hotel del Portal, at the Sierra end of the railroad, is a large, roomy, artistic building, finely equipped with accommodations for two hundred guests. Situated on a wooded plateau about one hundred and fifty feet above the station, it commands a splendid view on all sides—canyon and river and mountains and waterfalls. It stands at the foot of a mountain from whose peak you can survey the whole of Yosemite Valley sixteen miles away, El Captain, Half Dome and all the other wonders of that region. Across the river, in front of the hotel is a precipice 2,000 feet in height. The white, shimmering streak, which seems to pulsate in the sun's rays, is the famous Chinquapin Fall. It has a fascination which takes possession of you as you sit in comfort on the broad veranda of the hotel and watch the foamy water falling, falling.

GUESTS OF THE HOTEL DEL PORTAL

Who have run into the Yosemite for a sleigh ride.

Everything was so pleasant at the Hotel del Portal, the climate was so sunny and genial, the surroundings so restful and picturesque, and the hotel service so excellent that we stayed longer than we had intended, as many others have done.

The stage ride into Yosemite, with Henry Hedges driving, must always be a pleasure. After passing the Cascades we began to meet snow, first in patches and then covering the ground and every branch and rock and pinnacle, until one felt as in a dream. After an excellent dinner with appetites sharpened by the stage ride we started for a tramp in the woods. Though the snow lay a foot deep there was no bite in the air and, leaving our overcoats at the hotel, we simply put on rubbers as a precaution against wet feet.

Instinctively, it seemed, we turned to the Le Conte Memorial Lodge. Always beautiful and appropriate, it seemed more so then than ever as we climbed through the drifted snow on the steps and stood bareheaded before the door. As we turned away a jolly party came gliding swiftly by in a sleigh, singing and laughing in their joy and exhilaration, while the sleigh-bells tinkled away in the distance through the trees.

A TOBOGAN PARTY IN YOSEMITE

Enjoying the pleasures of the valley in the winter season.

The next day we discovered that Nelson Salter, that kindly genius who presides over the General Store and is always doing someone a good turn, had prepared an artificial pond within a hundred yards of Yosemite Vallage. By letting water flow over the ice every night a fine new sheet of glass-like ice is ready every morning. There are plenty of good skates, easily adjusted, and soon we are flashing up and down the pond, here, there, curving, gliding, falling, up again and at it, a merry crowd indeed.

Several of the best trails are open and on the sure-footed mules we climbed to Vernal Falls, snapping our cameras frequently as we went. Once down on the valley floor again it was a mile gallop to Mirror Lake, more pictures, and another two mile run through the woods to lunch.

Then came the stage once more and the ride down the canyon to Hotel del Portal, where we rested from our unusual exertions, compared experiences and argued on every subject except the beauty of Yosemite in winter and the comfort of Hotel del Portal.

To those who love the Sierras (and who does not?), to those who know them in summer but not in winter, a new story is at your door for your unfolding—a story which you can read nowhere but in California.

Delicious Fritzi Scheff

As my esteemed contemporaries of the daily press have very selfishly exhausted the visible supply of adjectives in their rapturous descriptions of the personality of Fritzi Scheff, I am constrained to adopt a manner of the utmost simplicity in dealing with her. Perhaps simplicity is best, after all. Is not simplicity the secret of Fritzi Scheff's power to charm? Genius is simple, as we all know; so perfectly simple that stupid people cannot understand it and attribute to it all sorts of ridiculous complexities. As Fritzi Scheff is a genius, the conclusion that her method is the method of simplicity is reached with syllogistic ease. Now simplicity is not the easiest thing in the world to analyze, so it is no mean task to explain simple Fritzi Scheff; the reason, no doubt, why the favorite adjectives of the critics are vague in their application. It is no trick to say that her charm is too evanescent for words, that her appeal is indescribable, that her beauty is inexpressible and so on. Fritzi Scheff is quite palpable and words there are to characterize her. I think that "delicious" is one of them. Let me contribute that to the general store of my exuberant contemporaries. To eye and ear and brain she affords exquisite pleasure; to the eye because of her quite irregular prettiness of face and her extremely regular beauty of form; to the ear because of her crystal pure birdlike voice; and to the brain because all her movements, all her moods, all her utterances are informed with the charm of a warm and sympathetic, though perhaps not very deep, mentality. "The Prima Donna" gives Miss Scheff admirable opportunities for the exploitation of her varied fascinations, but the very fact that it was written to her measure indicates its weakness. The greatest achievement of a great artist lies in the interpretation of a masterpiece and masterpieces are not written to fit particular artists, although tolerably good pieces very frequently are. "The Prima Donna" is a very good piece indeed, but one feels throughout that Miss Scheff has nothing to contend with, that there is nothing in the music against which she has to measure her artistry. It is all very easy for her because the composer had her limitations in mind when he wrote it. Puccini was not thinking of anybody's limitations when he wrote "La Boheme"; he was not building music to anybody's vocal proportions; he was producing a masterpiece and it was for the singers to attempt its adequate interpretation. Miss Scheff will not add one cubit to her artistic stature by singing such roles as that of "The Prima Donna," but she will undoubtedly add to the general joy of the American public which has a niche for her in its affections and will let her stay there as long as she likes. The book of the latest Scheff piece is worthy of special mention. Henry Blossom is the writer and certainly he gave Victor Herbert very stimulating stuff. The dialogue is always clever, some of the lines being so good that one would fain remember them for repetition. "Are you the pearl without price?" asks the tipsy soldier in the cafe. "No, I'm the pearl before swine." The words of the songs are full or originality. To those who think that there is nothing new in lyrics I commend the ditty, "Every Other Fellow's Girl Looks Better to Me Than Mine." And to those who think they are surfeited with German comedians I recommend John E. Hazzard who has one of the simplest, most offhanded comic manners imaginable. Miss Scheff could not have a more excellent foil. There are many other things which might be said about Miss Scheff and "The Prima Donna," but no doubt they have all been said before and the adjectives wherewith I might cunningly deck them out in the semblance of originality have all been preempted. 'Tis a sad state of affairs, but not without its compensations, some of which no doubt Miss Scheff could name if she cared to.

A Good Omen for the Savoy

When the Princess Theatre opened after the fire with Cecilia Rhoda at the head of a capable company in "The Mocking Bird," there was a girl of slender figure and snappy black eyes playing the soubrette role in a fashion which made instant appeal to the discriminating. Of course she had other things to distinguish her besides her snappy black eyes and her slender figure; else the discriminating would have been very easily pleased indeed. She had a good mezzo voice and a pair of legs that were as graceful as they were untiring. She had also a pretty face with a great deal of seriousness in it, except when it lit up with a piquant smile and then nothing seemed to be worth while but gaiety. Her speaking voice was good and her dramatic training, one could see, had merely refined and directed a natural gift. The girl's whole personality radiated intelligence; she was magnetic and had a quick way to the hearts of her audience. But of course the principal things were that good voice and that pair of graceful untiring legs. Zoe Barnett—for I am speaking of her—did not convince everybody that she had a bright future on that first night at the Princess; naturally it took two or three roles to bring out her abilities. But the point is that she was a success from her first San Francisco introduction and it is pleasant to be one of those who prophesied a fine future for her. Since the opening of the Princess Zoe Barnett has played many parts in this city, good, bad and indifferent—I remember one or two that were impossible—but she played them all with verve, with distinction, for all they were worth. She has come and gone once or twice since that opening night and on each return she has been welcomed with greater warmth. Her latest return is a triumph. I cannot think of a better omen for John Cort and his pretty new theatre, the Savoy in McAllister street, than the triumph which Zoe Barnett enjoyed last Sunday night. Triumph is the only word for it. The audience was "laying for" her from the beginning of "King Dodo" and before she was fairly on the stage they caught her up in a hearty embrace of plaudits and hugged her, so to speak. It must have been a great surprise to the other members of the cast and I am glad to say that it was a great surprise to Miss Barnett; it fairly took her breath away and I could swear that she was on the verge of tears. Later Miss Barnett was smothered with flowers, but flowers do not suggest spontaneous enthusiasm and it is the suddenly aroused fervor that manifests itself in applause which is particularly dear to a player. Zoe Barnett's welcome was the best sort of a christening for the Savoy Theatre; it starts the history of the house with a sweet memory. Besides it will be something to recall and talk about when Miss Barnett makes her Broadway debut, as she surely will one of these fine days. The Savoy Theatre is a very comfortable playhouse, tastefully decorated, with a good stage and roomy divan chairs. It was hard to realize that the same walls supported the old Colonial where Frank Bacon amused some very large audiences in the post-earthquake days when theatrical entertainment was not so plentiful as it is now. There is very little left of the Colonial except the walls, but I imagine that even these hold a few pleasant memories for theatregoers. There is no reason why Cort's house should not be popular if it lives up to its opening night. "King Dodo" was given very satisfactorily by principals, chorus and orchestra. Let Cort continue as he has started and we will have no cause for complaint, especially if Zoe Barnett comes back once in a while.

The Orpheum Road Show

Every year the lovers of vaudeville rub their palms with satisfaction when the first posters announcing the Orpheum road show appear on the bill-boards. In the vaudeville of the West there is no greater treat. San Francisco has long appreciated its high excellence and has always included it among the prime entertainments of the holiday season. The road show starts with this Sunday's matinee under the personal direction of Martin Beck, general manager of the circuit. Bill-topping honors are shared, we are told, by La Titcomb, known as the singer on horseback and dainty Ida O'Day. La Titcomb has an act which includes singing, serpentine dancing and riding with novel lighting effects. It is said that her American beauty turned the heads of many of the gilded youths of Paris. Her costume is white, tight-fitting and cut directoire, according to the press agent who knows all about such things, and her mount is a white Arabian steed. Miss O'Day who used to sit at the footlights and smile and thrum a banjo, to the general satisfaction, is now playing "Saucers" in "A Bit of Old Chelsea," a part which Mrs. Fiske made famous. In a day or so we will know whether Miss O'Day is warranted in thus boldly vying with one of our greatest actresses. From all acounts this young woman has made rapid strides in her profession. Melville and Higgins come with "Just a Little Fun." Mae Melville has a reputation for being one of the funny women of the stage and Robert Higgins is well recommended. Hyman Meyer is the "Man at the Piano" who made a great hit in this city a year ago. His is a musical monologue and he unites humor with rare skill as a pianist. Fay, Two Coleys and Fay, bring a blackface act called "The Minstrels" dealing with the woes of four stranded members of an Uncle Tom's Cabin troupe. Then there is "A Night in a Monkey Music Hall" presented by Miss Maud Rochez. This is a European act which has excited a great deal of amazement. The only holdovers in the bill will be Carl Nobel and Harry Fox and the Millership Sisters who have scored heavily during the week. It is too bad, by the way, that we are not to have another week of Donald Bowles in his powerful little play "Guilty." Donald Bowles made many friends among theatregoers in this city when he came here with James Neill and Edythe Chapman. He showed himself at that time an actor particularly capable in the depiction of intense characters like the mad soldier in "Barbara Frietchie." Those who saw Bowles in that part have never forgotten him. In "Guilty" he finds a splendid vehicle for his powers and it is to be regretted that he will not be with us for another week.

"The Man from Home" at the Valencia

The last performances of "The Gay Musician" will take place at the Valencia this Saturday afternoon and evening, and on Sunday night Liebler and Company's production of "The Man from Home" will begin a two weeks' engagement. The coming of this celebrated play, the joint work of Booth Tarkington and Harry Leon Wilson is regarded as an event of importance. The local premiere of "The Man from Home" is the tangible evidence of the much discussed alliance between Liebler & Co. and the Shuberts, which has so changed the theatrical map in every city of importance from San Francisco eastward. "The Man from Home" company is headed by Henry Hall and includes Charles D. Herman, so long with the Warde-James Shakespearean productions, Harrington Reynolds, Mary Elizabeth Forbes, Harrison Fisher's famous poster girl who was last seen here with Lillian Russell in "Wildfire," Bertha Welby, Mary Meffert, Leonard Howe, Vaughan Trevor, Albert Roccardi, John Martin, Harry Brewster and others. "The Man from Home" carries its own scenic equipment complete and will be presented here with the attention to detail which marked its three years' run in New York and Chicago. The only matinee performances will be given on Christmas and New Years.

Cohan Show at Savoy

The last performances of "King Dodo" will take place at the new Savoy Theatre in McAllister street near Market this Saturday afternoon and evening, and on Sunday night, "Forty-five Minutes from Broadway," George M. Cohan's famous musical production, will begin an engagement limited to one week. In the hands of Elizabeth Drew, "Plain Mary" has been pronounced wonderfully pathetic and convincing. Charley Brown as the "Kid" has been well received all over the country. With the exception of these two the original company comes to the Savoy. A bargain matinee will be given on Thursday, with the usual performance on Christmas afternoon.

A New Play at the Alcazar

A play replete with human interest and thrilling situations is "Pierre of the Plains" which will be given its first presentation in California next Monday evening and throughout the week at the Alcazar. Edgar Selwyn adapted it from Sir Gilbert Parker's widely-read novel of the Canadian border, "Pierre and His People," and it ran one season in New York and another on the road, with Mr. Selwyn in the title role. Each of the four acts calls for an elaborate setting, and the pictorial side of the play is extremely attractive. Evelyn Vaughan will play Jen and John Ince will be seen as Pierre, a part for which he is admirably adapted both physically and by temperament. Howard Hickman is cast for Sergeant Redding, Will R. Walling for Jap Durkin, Louis Bennison for the elder Galbraith and William Garwood for his son. All the minor roles, which are numerous and varied, will be adequately filled.

Rural Comedy at Ye Liberty

The Christmas week offering at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will be Neil Burgess' famous old comedy, "The County Fair." Year after year Burgess starred in it and although it would be hard to find an old-timer who does not fondly remember his creation of "Aunt Abby," the piece will be practically new to the younger generation of playgoers across the bay for it is a good many years since he presented it on the coast. In George Fried Ye Liberty management are fortunate in having a comedian superbly suited to the role of "Aunt Abby." With his legitimate methods and unctuous humor he should present a most delightful interpretation of the character. Maribel Seymour will appear as "Taggs," the most important of the feminine roles, and most of the remaining favorites of the company will be seen in the cast. The great race scene will be splendidly reproduced, and altogether "The County Fair" should keep holiday theatregoers of Oakland in a happy state of mind. James M. Barrie's "The Admirable Crichton" is in preparation for New Year's week.

What to Wear, When and Where

Written exclusively for Town Talk by J. M. JACOBI

Newspaper Clips from Fairchild's, London

A fashion writer in the London Sunday Times reports: "A particular kind of fancy waistcoat is likely to be a rarity, because the material from which it is made is manufactured, so I am told, by only one firm, and at present there is hardly enough stuff to go around. It is very smooth, fine cloth and is of a peculiar texture. The stuff is so soft that a waistcoat made of it can be practically molded to the figure. This cloth is made in every shade that a man can think of, and not a bad one among them. At present this stuff has not been imitated, and I doubt if it will be possible for the imitators to reproduce anything quite like it. I should add that the material has no pattern on it and that some of the best shades are subdued enough to suit the quietest man in London—whoever he may be."

A New Stormproof Overcoating

The same writer comments: "The other day I was looking at some new overcoatings that Mr. Ellis of 201 Strand has asked me to inspect. Mr. Ellis seems to me to have hit on the happiest of names for the particular overcoating of which he is making a specialty this season. It is called the 'Stormproof.' Everybody has heard of rainproof overcoatings; the mention of the word makes you think of a thin, smooth cloth, light in weight, excellent for the purpose for which it is intended, but of little use to a man on a rough winter's day. Similarly the word 'Stormproof' as applied to cloth seems to suggest a rough, thick material which, made up into a long overcoat, will keep the wearer dry and warm during the heaviest downpour of rain or in a blinding snowstorm on a bitterly cold day. The cloth in question is an Irish frieze specially prepared to resist rain and snow. A coat of this description gives warmth and yet is not heavy. The cloth is to be had in a large variety of patterns and colorings, the newest being a pattern composed of stripes of black and gray. Mr. Ellis has bought this cloth in such large quantities that he is able to sell a coat of it, made in any way that the buyer may require, for three guineas."

A Smart Coat

The Tailor and Cutter says: "We congratulate George Alexander, the well-known actor, on his interpretation of the latest thing in smart overcoats. He is now wearing a fly-front Chesterfield faced with bright silk to the edges, and rolling to the waist. It is close-fitting and has a seam up the center of back, finished with a deep vent; it has horizontal flap pockets on the hips and plenty of fullness in the skirts. This strikes us as a very neat modification of the new D. B. low-rolling Chesterfield."

The New Twill

"The new broad twill is becoming more and more popular for overcoats as well as suits; but, while it has a very smart appearance in the body, yet, when it comes to the facings on the lapels, it is extremely ugly, for the twill on the one lapel runs parallel to the edge, while that on the other runs horizontally and presents a most odd appearance. This is a defect that could be easily avoided by a little readjustment of the facing on the one side. We think it would be best to arrange both laps with the twill to run parallel with the front edge, when the effect will be decidedly smart."

Turned Up Trousers Doomed

The News Leader prints the following: "Blue is undoubtedly the most fashionable color for men's attire at the present time.

"Indigo of a rather light blend is the most popular tone, but a really bright blue, sometimes with a vertical stripe, is also permissible. The tobacco brown material of the early spring has, on the other hand, almost entirely disappeared from the West End.

"Another vanishing fashion," says the Tailor and Cutter, "is that of turning up one's trouser bottoms. Turned-up trousers most emphatically are going out, and it may be added that they certainly look out of keeping with a warm bright day.

"Trousers creases on the other hand are very much in evidence, not only do they much increase the smartness of the garment, but they minimize the 'Bagginess' of the knees.

"Next to blue, as a favorite color, comes grey—of may diverse shades and materials. Iron gray hop sack worsted of thin texture in the lighter shades of gray flannel, both in self-colors and stripes, is well represented.

"Light waistcoats are being much worn at present, and are fashioned either of a silk mixture or of a simple washing material. The edges are often bound with a dark color binding.

"Foreign fashions also have not escaped the eagle eye of the sartorial expert, and the clothes of American visitors appear not to meet with his approval.

"Their garments," he says, "are mostly of the lounge type, made up in an extreme style; generally they are very long, though sometimes they are very short, very loose fitting and wide in the shoulders."

Chas. W. Morse, Ice King and Convict

millions and Morse had again boosted the price of ice stock long enough to allow him to unload his holdings and retire from that particular business with more than ten millions.

Then Morse turned his attention to the business of banking which was destined to wreck his career. He realized that to get rich quickly it was necessary to own banks, so he started acquiring a string in New York. In 1902 he was the owner of a round dozen, as big a chain as had ever been brought together under single control. His method of acquisition was very simple; he put up the stock of one bank as collateral for a loan with which he bought the stock of another. Next Morse determined to make himself the master of American shipping. He operated again as in the case of the banks and in 1907 when ruin impended, he owned eighty-one ocean-going steamers to say nothing of smaller craft on the Hudson and other rivers. Besides this he was the boss of thirteen banks and dominant in the management of a score of other corporations, including several insurance companies. The amount of the combined stock of the companies he controlled was $125,000,000. Then came Morse's plunge into the treacherous bog of copper dealing and the beginning of the end. With the Heinzes and Thomases he determined to corner the market in copper and began borrowing money in enormous sums from his banks. The money was obtained on notes made in some cases by clerks who acted as dummies. When some of the banks were loaded up with these notes, copper stock began to appear from unexpected places and the contemplated corner was made impossible. The Clearing House made an investigation and Morse went to Europe with the federal district attorney at his heels. He returned to face trial and was found guilty of misapplying the funds of the Bank of North America.

The fight for liberty that followed was spectacular but futile. In the course of it, however, Morse began wiping out his debts and he will owe practically nothing when he goes to prison. On the day that he was taken to a cell to await deportation to the federal penitentiary he was elected president of one of his reorganized steamship companies. It was evident from that spectacular coup that he had powerful backers, as indeed he should, having enriched many on his way to fabulous wealth. Morse declared only a few days ago that he was unconscious of having ever done anything wrong; he assumed the attitude of an innocent man greatly sinned against. That is at it may be, but as I have remarked already, it would be rash to say that his career has been finished.

Da Vinci or R. C. Lucas

the lines laid down by da Vinci in his treatise on painting. In the third place the flowers in the hair indicate that it is a bust of Flora and da Vinci was partial to Floras. In the fourth and all other places, Dr. Bode just simply knew what he was talking about and it was a bust by da Vinci, so there! This was interesting and all very well until one day the Times published a letter from a Southhampton antiquary and auctioneer named Cooksey. Cooksey must be an irreverent and sceptical dog, because he took sharp issue with Dr. Bode. He dared to say through the columns of the Thunderer that the bust was not by da Vinci, but that it was the work of an English sculptor of the last century named Richard Cockle Lucas. Richard Cockle Lucas had lived in Southampton and all the art pundits knew a little about him, especially after Cooksey refreshed their minds. Lucas had a studio in Southampton and was noted for his expertness in restoring or copying the works of the old masters in sculpture. To prove his allegation Cooksey produced an album of photographs of Lucas' works in which was a reproduction of a bust very much like the bust for which Dr. Bode had paid $40,000. The bust in the photograph is discreetly veiled as to the breasts by a bit of drapery which had been thrown over it before it was photographed. Of course that complicates the work of comparison, hard enough at any time between a bust and a photograph of a bust. But that was not all the evidence. The son of Richard Cockle Lucas, a very old man, came forward and told how his father had acquired a Flora painting undoubtedly the work of da Vinci and had used it in modeling a bust; he told how the bust had been kept in his father's studio and photographed; and he said that Dr. Bode had purchased the identical bust. You may imagine how much all this delighted the Londoners. To see a celebrated art director from Berlin buncoed like an unsuspecting rustic just simply tickled them to death; so they rang the changes on the theme till Dr. Bode felt like a pfennig with a hole in it.

Dr. Bode meditated revenge. What did he do? It was all very simple. He took the wax bust to Berlin, gave it a splendid position in his museum and invited everybody to come and say whether it was or was not a work of Leonardo da Vinci. That was where the Kaiser came in. Of course, being something of an artist himself, he had followed the bitter dispute in the English newspapers. He saw his opportunity and grasped it with both mailed fists. He announced that he was going to the museum to inspect the bust. There was great excitement in Berlin. The papers got out extras; the burghers could talk of nothing else over their beer and limburger. Finally the great day came. The Kaiser, attended by a retinue of formidable proportions, clanked into the museum in full military regalia. The whole staff of the museum was on hand with Dr. Bode at their head wearing his best bib and tucker and sporting his finest smile. While all held their breaths Dr. Bode led the Kaiser to the wax bust. There it stood smiling its enigmatical smile at the Kaiser who frowned back at it in deep study. Nobody dared to move in the presence of imperial contemplation. Like Nero rapt in ecstacy by one of his own tunes, the Kaiser hypnotized himself into a condition of artistic coma. After a time he stroked his mustache and Dr. Bode wondered what that meant. Then he snorted a little and the assembled dignitaries quailed. Leonardo da Vinci probably trembled in his grave. But all things come to an end and so did this solemn ceremonial. Slowly the Kaiser spoke, like one pronouncing a great and hitherto unknown truth, and everybody privileged to be present hung anxiously on his words. The Kaiser declared that the bust was the work of da Vinci!

London is still sceptical; Paris is openly satirical, but Berlin is convinced. A great dispute is settled and if it is established some day that Richard Cockle Lucas and not Leonardo da Vinci wrought the pretty bust, there will probably be a revolution in Germany or else the Kaiser will die in an excess of artistic mortification.

Rector—I hope you realize that it is very wrong of you to go about the country in this—irregular way?

Cannon—It's company, like.

Rector (staggered)—I was speaking of the moral aspect of the case—

Cannon—I know. Just as yer please. Don't mind me. (Pause.) Will ye marry us?

Rector—I will consider the question.

Cannon (indicating the roadway)—Shall I fetch 'er?

Rector—If you please.

Cannon (rises, turns)—I expect she's come, by this time. She was a bit be'ind. That's 'ow we allus go. 'Arf a mile apart. Saves naggin'. We see enough of one another every night. When yer got a 'ouse o' yer own yer can sit in different rooms, or go out and walk the streets. But on the roads, wiv an empty stumick—take my tip. 'Arf a mile apart! (He goes to the gate, and utters a low whistle.) Are you there, Jinny? Aye, 'ere she is!

(Jinny enters. She comes forward nervously, laying down her bundle.)

Cannon (in an undertone)—Buck up, ole gal! It's all right. 'E's game.

Rector—Good afternoon. Ah—I understand from your friend that you wish to be married?

Jinny—Yes, sir. If you please, sir.

Cannon (audibly)—Not so 'umble, ole gal. Stand up to 'im!

Jinny (to the Rector)—Oh, sir, I hope you won't mind what 'e says. 'E do talk so wild. But 'e means well.

Cannon (to Jinny)—'Ere, stow it!

Rector (kindly)—Well, well, we shall see. Perhaps something can be arranged. . . . And now—I suppose you are very hungry?

Jinny—Yes, sir.

Rector (calling)—Miss Pippin! (The housekeeper appears.) Will you please give this young woman a meal. And (in an undertone) have you engaged a new housemaid yet?

Housekeeper—Not yet, Mr. Armitage.

Rector—Then perhaps we can give her a trial. Just for a few weeks. You understand?

(Housekeeper eyes Jinny with disfavor.)

Rector (to Jinny)—There. That way. Never mind your bag. That's right.

(The housekeeper and Jinny go into the house. The Rector comes back rubbing his hands.)

Cannon (after a pause)—I suppose you're one of them blokes wot go about doin' good? Bloomin' Samaritan, eh?

Rector (overflowing with satisfaction)—Well, in one's limited sphere, and when opportunity offers. . . . But don't let us speak of that. I suppose you know that you will have to live within the parish for some little time before you can be married?

Cannon—Yus.

Rector—Then there are the banns—

Cannon (suspiciously)—Wot's that?

Rector—Ah—we can discuss the details later. First we must find you work. What is your trade?

Cannon—Joiner. Trade unionist. Out of a job these three years.

Rector—Ah! No doubt you will take any work that offers itself?

Cannon—Depends.

Rector—Depends upon what?

Cannon—On the wages, o' course. None o' yer "'Ere's a 'arf a crown, my good man. Touch yer 'at and say 'Thank yer'!" Not for me!

Rector—I should have thought you would be grateful for any—

Cannon—Would yer? Then you're wrong. Yer can't expect gratitude for twelve bob a week. Or if yer do, you've come ter the wrong shop! Employer ought ter be grateful ter git 'is dirty work done cheap.

Rector—But I hope you would take work if it were—

Cannon—Tike it? Course I'll tike it. 'Cos I got a bloomin' stummick wot 'as ter be filled. And for 'er. . . . But as for gratitude—pah! (He expectorates. The rector watches him as if fascinated.) 'Tain't you nor any other man who employs me or lets me starve. 'Tis Serciety. See?

Rector—Ah—I realize that our social order is not all that it might be—

Cannon (in mock amazement)—No? You don't say so? You've made a big discovery, ole man. You'll 'ave ter look out.

Rector (nettled)—I mean, of course, that there is an unfortunate gulf between rich and poor—

Cannon (with contempt)—Gulf? There's a bloomin' clawss war, that's wot there is! You can be grateful to Serciety, if you like. I should be if I was you. But bein' meself, I'm not. See?

Rector (hopefully)—Come, I feel sure you will easily find something to do. You seem to be an intelligent man—

Cannon—'Ere, stow that! 'Oo are yer getting at?

Rector—I am not "getting at" you, as you put it. I mean that you have, if I may say so, a peculiar aptitude in voicing your grievances. . . .

Cannon—'Ere, would you like ter know what my grievance really is?

Rector—Well?

Cannon—'Cos I'll tell yer. First of all I want a 'ouse. And a garden, where I can grow things in me spare time. Like yours. See?

(Rector nods.)

Cannon (meditatively)—About the furniture—books and pictures an' all that—well, I dunno. But I want 'em. (Warming to his subject.) Then I want a woman ter live wiv me. And some kids. Same as you 'ave.

Rector (hastily)—Ah—I am not married—

Cannon (unmoved)—Never mind. P'raps you will be. Any 'ow, I want 'em. An' I want the 'ouse properly arranged—meals at reg'lar hours, and no waitin'. See?

(Rector is speechless.)

Cannon—Then I want ter be a kid again meself, and ter be brought up different. With manners. And eddication. All wot you got. (Reflectively): There's a few more things, like travel, 'olidays abroad, and p'raps a stinkin' motor car. They may be all right when yer git inside 'em. But them's luxuries. Wot I said before, that's wot I want. And my grievance is that I don't get it. See?

Rector—I understand. But you must know that every one cannot have these advantages, as society is at present constituted—

Cannon—Then scrap yer bloomin' serciety, and start afresh! 'Cos if yer don't, it'll git scrapped for yer. See? Take my tip. Scrap it!

Rector—It is very wrong for you to speak like that.

Cannon—Preach me yer sermons, p'raps?

Rector—No. I can find you work. Will you do it?

Cannon—You'll get me work, arter wot I said?

Rector—I will do my best. That will be a fresh start for you.

Cannon—A fresh start. . . . ?

(Rector goes into the house. Jinny comes out by the side door.)

Cannon—'Ullo, Jinny! This is a bit of all right, ain't it. (She does not reply.) Why, wots' up wiv yer?

Jinny—O' Bert, I can't do it. I can't!

Cannon—Cawn't do wot?

Jinny—I—I don't want ter git married—

Cannon—Well, soak me bob, you are a wunner! An' you bin at me every day this last ten weeks an' more—

Jinny—O, I know. But they wanter make a 'ousemaid of me. Wiv a cap an' strings. An' a bloomin' little time-table for gettin' up an' doin' things all day. An' a bedroom wiv texts. An' that old cat of a 'ousekeeper naggin' at me from mornin' to night. O, she's a 'oly terror, she is. Never done nothink wrong in 'er life. An' knows it. You take a look at 'er eyes. I nearly blacked one of 'em for 'er jes now.

(A girl passes across the lawn with a tennis racquet. She glances at them in surprise, and then goes into the house.)

There's another of 'em. A lidy this time. No, I cawn't do it! I ain't no clawss!

Cannon—'Oo says you ain't no clawss?

Jinny—O, you know it, Bert. You know. I ain't got the cheek ter stand up to 'em, same as you 'ave. They can git over me wiv their tricks. (Coming to him) Bert!

Cannon—Well?

Jinny—Let's—'ook it!

Cannon—Wot—now?

Jinny—Yus.

Cannon—Jest when I got a job?

Jinny—Oh, Bertie, yer don't mind, do yer? See—I'll never nag at yer to marry me again! (She comes close to him.)

Cannon—Did yer git a good meal?

Jinny—Not 'arf!

Cannon—Wot?

Jinny—'Am, an' eggs, an' jam, an' everything.

Cannon—Feel good?

Jinny—Feels—like 'eaven. (They laugh.)

Cannon—An' so yer wanter sleep out tonight, do yer? Give me a kiss?

Jinny (playfully pushing him)—Ow, git along!

Cannon—Well, I'm on. (He takes the bundle upon his back.) Come, Jinny!

Jinny—'Ush! There 'e is!

Rector (comes down the steps from his study, and into the garden. As he sees them)—Why, what does this mean?

Jinny—If you please, sir—

Cannon—We've changed our minds.

Rector—Changed your minds?

Cannon—About marryin'. We thought it was better not. So long. And thank yer all the same.

(They go out before the rector has recovered his speech. He hurries over to the gate, seems about to call after them, but checks himself, and stands watching them until they pass out of sight at a turn of the road. Then he comes slowly back into the garden. The housekeeper stands at the door, smiling. He looks at her with some annoyance. She continues to smile. With a quick exclamation and a little whisk of his coat tails he goes past her and disappears into his study.)

MEMORANDUM

The first publication of this Summons was made in "Town Talk" newspaper on the 18th day of December, A. D. 1909.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff: None.

HUGH O'NEILL, Attorney for Plaintiff. 12-18-10

Auto Notes

The following telegram has been received by the Studebaker Bros: "E-M-F won first prize in touring car class in big four-day-across-Florida-run. The most strenuous thing of the kind ever given. There were sixteen starters all told."

Mrs. Annie F. Clay of Oakland has recently purchased a six-cylinder seventy horsepower Thomas touring car, in which she expects to do considerable touring. The car is a very attractive one, being painted gray with plum colored stripes.

Capt. J. A. Dougherty of the Presidio is one of the many army men who have become enthusiastic motorists. The captain recently purchased a 1910 Chalmers-Detroit, and with his family spends considerable time driving about the city and vicinity. While they have not as yet taken any long trips in the car, it is their intention to do so as soon as the weather will permit.

During the past thirty days the Lord Motor Car Company of Los Angeles, agents for the Studebaker Bros. Company of California, have accepted delivery of fifty-one Studebaker E-M-F "30" cars, six Studebaker-Garford "40" cars and one electric coupe and one electric Victoria-Phaeton. All of these cars have, in turn been sold to residents of Southern California. A large sign in the showroom of the Lord company bears the following pertinent legend: "We are too busy selling Studebaker cars to knock others."

Harris Hanshue, famous as the driver of the Apperson Jack-Rabbit, is a very warm advocate of the new Diamond Demountable Rim. In a letter to the Diamond Rubber Co. he is loud in the praise of the services given by this type in such events as the Oakland-Portola heavy car race, Redlands mile high hill climb and the 150 mile Ascot Park race, all of which he won handily. In the 150 mile race in Los Angeles he effected a change on account of a puncture in one minute and a half.

An indication of the importance attached at the present time to the automobile industry on the coast is found in the fact that most of the best known agents in Los Angeles and San Francisco are erecting new and modern buildings for their headquarters. This is especially true of the automobile dealers in this city. Several have recently completed buildings for their salesroom which compare favorably with any in the world. Prominent among these buildings is that of the Standard Motor Car Company, corner of Golden Gate and Van Ness avenues. This is a large brick, fire proof building, the lower part used as a salesroom for the Ford and Velie cars, the top floor devoted to a thoroughly equipped repair shop in which the machinery and entire plant of Ivan L. deJongh has just been placed.

Mrs. M. A. Huntington of this city is one of the latest to realize the value of the new Diamond Grip Anti-Skid casing and is having the rear wheels of her car equipped with them.

J. A. Lavensaller of this city has become a convert to the new Diamond Grip casing and is having the rear wheels of his car equipped with them.

W. H. Turner, factory representative for the E. R. Thomas Motor Company, arrived in this city, coming direct from Boston. Mr. Turner is one of the best known automobile experts and salesmen in the East. He will spend several months on the coast making his headquarters with the Pioneer Automobile Company of this city and will make trips to Los Angeles and through the Northwest to Portland and Seattle.

Charles S. Howard, head of the Howard Automobile Company, distributors of Oldsmobiles and Buicks, commenting on the situation in general, says: "I think the buying public is beginning to realize the importance of purchasing their automobiles when able to get delivery. I think this is the reason that we are doing 100 per cent more business than we ever did before at this season of the year. Of course we are getting new motors in much larger quantities than we ever did before at this time of the year. The factory is realizing that a big winter business can be gotten on the coast if they get the cars out here early. We are getting Buicks in at the rate of three or four carloads a week right along but have been unable so far to get a stock ahead as the cars are sold and delivered just about as fast as they arrive."

The new Diamond Grip Tire is becoming immensely popular. Mr. S. T. Meyer who has just purchased a new Locomobile is having the rear wheels of his car equipped with them.

It is claimed that the Rambler, because of its offset crank shaft, can be operated most smoothly and steadily when running even as slowly as three miles an hour under load, in crowded traffic or on a hill or sandy road. A prize was recently offered by H. T. D. Wilson, Houston, Texas, to the car that would make a quarter of a mile in high gear at the slowest rate of speed. By the rules of this contest the drivers were compelled to use the high gear throughout the race. The object of the race was to demonstrate which machine could best be operated on a crowded throughfare on high speed without danger of colliding with other vehicles. Four cars entered. Two were disqualified, being unable to travel this distance on high gear at such a low rate of speed without killing the engine. The Rambler won the event, consuming four minutes and thirty-five seconds of time.

R. K. Roberts of the Howard Automobile Co. who has just returned from an extended trip over the Northern part of the State in the interest of the Buick and Oldsmobile, brings most flattering reports from all sections visited. Roberts said: "I can only reiterate with even greater emphasis my firm conviction that the coming season will be a record breaker. While it has been generally conceded by all that the season of 1910 would produce a greater volume of business than the automobile world has yet known, I confess that I had no conception of the real magnitude of what it will surely be."

One of the most important changes of the present automobile season was announced recently by Mr. W. L. Hughson, President of the Standard Motor Car Company, to the effect that the State agent of the Ford and Velie cars has purchased the machinery and repair plant of Ivan deJongh, the well known automobile expert. DeJongh who is recognized as one of the most expert automobile mechanics on the coast has one of the largest establishments for repairing and making automobiles in the West and by securing both the plant and services of Mr. deJongh, the Standard Motor Car Company have added an important feature to their mechanical department. All the machinery of the deJongh house will be moved to the new building of the Standard Motor Car Company, corner of Van Ness and Golden Gate avenues.

Last week the Buick "White Streak" base ball team won two games, one from the Loziers and one from the John Swett Grammar School team. The Buicks are out with a challenge to any 11 to 12 year old team in the city.

"Why American Marriages Fail"

The pleasure which might otherwise have greeted the small violet-covered volume entitled "Why American Marriages Fail" will be dimmed by the discovery that it is "In Memoriam Anna Alexander Rogers." The contents are made up of the more recent critical essays of the author, which, when published in monthly periodicals, attracted attention and comment, for Mrs. Rogers was a drastic critic of Americans and their institutions, though she was far from being a carping fault-finder. On the contrary, her objections to Americans and their tolerances was that of a judicious monitor, grieved and humiliated by the needless gaucheries and egotism of her countrymen and women. Mrs. Rogers was the daughter of General Alexander of the Union army and the wife of a naval officer. Though she often found herself an exile, she was never an expatriate, and her sojournings in other countries did not engender in her a spirit of fault-finding with things at home simply because they were home ways. Neither was she imbued with that self-satisfied elation which, starting out with the assumption that the United States is in all things perfect, goes to the other extreme of finding nothing commendable elsewhere. She was not one of those restless spirits ever on the alert for some "cause" to espouse, some topic to exploit, but spoke only at intervals, when she had a message to deliver, and then, forcibly and to the point. Practical common sense and keen insight mark her utterances, and there is a full meal of strong meat in every one of these half-dozen discussions of the topics: "Why American Marriages Fail"; "Some Faults of American Men"; "Why American Mothers Fail"; "What We Put Up With"; "Behind the Times," and "Some Fallacies in our Education." Mrs. Rogers' views are not pessimistic, since the remedies for the evils suggest themselves and would be applied automatically were the public but to take notice of the need, for our national bad manners are but the cumulation of individual selfishness and heedlessness. There is no other country in all the wide world where civility is confounded with servility and impudence with independence. Mrs. Rogers says nothing on that fruitful topic, the American abroad, but confines her strictures to our own land and the impression made on the returning exile and the foreign visitor. Her remarks have the force of a fireside admonition rather than that of a public exposure, and deserve all the more attention because of that attitude. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

Futrelle's "Diamond Master"

Readers who recall with pleasure Edwin Le Fevre's "Golden Flood" will have a welcome ready for Jacques Futrelle's "Diamond Master," for the two stories belong to the same class, though Mr. Futrelle's conceit would affect a smaller circle, since we are not all deeply concerned with the danger of swamping the diamond market. The idea was probably suggested by the recent fraudulent Parisian sensation, but it takes no very great amount of imagination to picture the consternation of the diamond dealers confronted with the danger of having several million dollars' worth of genuine gems dumped on the market, without regard to the effect on their fortunes and without the power to control the unknown source of supply. The action is brief and rapid. Simultaneously, five of the largest gem dealers in New York receive throught the mails, on the same day, an absolutely pure and perfect diamond. No mark of identification indicates the source and no letter of instruction accompanies the treasure. Submitted to the scrutiny of experts, the gems are pronounced genuine and perfectly cut. In fact, they are the most perfect stones known to exist. Amazement is divided between admiration of their perfection and conjecture as to the identity of the careless and indifferent owner when a letter is received appointing a conference, and at the appointed time there arrives a man young and alert, who, in the course of negotiations, casually takes from his pocket the Kohinoor, the Orloff, and a few other historic gems, and empties in a heap from his hand bag several million dollars' worth of cut and polished stones. His proposition is to the point. Either the diamond mechants must agree to purchase, at half the market rate, a hundred million dollars' worth of diamonds, or he will throw them on the market regardless of anything but his own profit. Virtually they are held up. To refuse is to court ruin, yet to agree is little short of robbery in their eyes, and they follow the only course open to them. It is to be expected that they have already employed detectives to find out not only the mysterious cache, but all that they can of the agent or owner, and a merry dance he leads and misleads them during the three days that intervene between the conference and the tragedy which destroys the source of the treasure. Readers who recall their early lessons in elementary chemistry will see the same light which revealed itself to the expert, Czenki, when Detective Birnes reported his discovery that the exhibitor and negotiator, E. Van Cortlandt Wynne, was an importer of brown sugar. The others will be divided, like Latham and Schultze, between commonplace assumption of a smuggling syndicate or a newly discovered American field and the possibilities of meteorites, and electrical phenomena. As Wynne says, every school boy knows how a diamond could be made. That is no secret at all. What Mr. Futrelle has conceived is a practical means of applying the demonstrated theory in such a way as to produce stones of marketable size at a cost sufficiently small in proportion to justify the effort. There is a better prospect of success in this line than there is in tinkering with perpetual motion and bottles which cannot be refilled. "The Diamond Master" is not too long to be read at one sitting and the interest is of that compelling kind which demands that one's curiosity shall be satisfied without delay. Say, is Sing Sing far from here?

Well, it took me an hour to go there and a year to get back.

The Invitation

Will you join my little party
With covers laid for ten?
A bunch of blushing beauties
And a few congenial men?

You modern men so hate a crowd,
If you will keep the date,
I'll take the list and cut it down
To covers laid for eight.

In fact, if that's too large a crowd,
The figures we can fix,
For many a man has many a joy
With covers laid for six.

I have a pretty friend, well versed
In all the palmist's lore,
So, if you like that sort of thing,
We'll make the covers four.

So call me up tomorrow, please,
Whatever else you do,
And do not tremble in your fear
Of covers laid for two.

The hour is eight, or thereabouts
And, pray, R. S. V. P.,
For every Jack must have his Jill,
Or he'll be lonely—see?

Hints for Conductors

A certain young and aspiring musician had so far been successful in getting up minor concerts that he aspired to becoming an accepted conductor. Consequently he was always on the alert to learn something from the acts and manners of any conductor of note whom he happened to see. Great was his delight to find an advertisement in the local newspaper offering valuable hints to rising conductors. "Just the thing for me," said he. "I see my way to prominence." So with a little hesitation he dispatched the ten dollar fee; but what was his surprise on receiving the following hints for which he had paid so dearly: "Take lessons in swimming and carpet-beating. Confine your attention to your toilet—to cuffs, collars, gloves, and back-hair, and always bear in mind your cuffs and shirt-front cannot be too much displayed. Tap vigorously on the desk, and give a prolonged 'Hush' in all soft passages. It draws the attention of the audience from the music to the conductor. At the conclusion of each piece wipe your forehead—whether it needs it or not. Scowl occasionally at the man with the double-bass, and directly the drummer comes in with his part, wave your left hand violently in his direction—it keeps down his vanity. If you wear long hair, throw it back by a graceful swing of the head, for it helps to remind the audience that all the merit is yours."

That new farm hand used to be a bookkeeper.

How do you know?

Every time he stops work for a minute he tries to put the pitchfork behind his ear.

Were there any lions at Mrs. Blingum's reception?

Yes, and she fed them—with daughters.

A Boy's Essay

A boy, fourteen years old, recently imported from Kentucky, handed the following in as a composition on "Breathing." The instruction was, "Tell all you can about breathing." He said, "Breath is made of air. We breathe with our lungs, our lights, our liver, and kidneys. If it wasn't for our breath we should die when we slept. Our breath keeps the life a-going through the nose when we are asleep. Boys that stay in a room all day should not breathe. They should wait till they get out of doors. Boys in a room make bad, unwholesome air. They make carbonicide. Carbonicide is poisoner than mad dogs. A heap of soldiers was in a black hole in India, and a carbonicide got in that there hole and killed nearly every one afore morning. Girls kill the breath with corosits, that squeezes the diagram. Girls can't holler or run like boys, because their diagram is squeezed too much. If I was a girl I'd ruther be a boy, so I can holler and run and have a great big diagram."

A gentleman traveling stopped at the house of a pious old woman, and, observing her fondness for a pet dog, ventured to ask the name of the animal.

The good woman answered by saying that she called him "Moreover."

"Is not that a strange name?" inquired the gentleman.

"Yes," said the pious lady; "but I thought it must be a good one as I found it in the Bible."

"Found it in the Bible!" quoted the gentleman. "Pray, in what part of the Bible did you find it?"

The old lady took down her Bible with the utmost reverence, and, turning to the text, read as follows: "Moreover, the dog came and licked his sores."

That horrid woman could never make a man happy.

She did, though. She got a divorce last week.

Jesus Christ: Gentleman

By Harry Cowell

Save the aspect set forth in the title of this Christmas lay sermon, all aspects of the Christ have been done to death, crucified and crowned with thorns ten thousand times over, much of the tortured torturous handling of the sacred subject enough to call forth afresh those most heart-broken and heart-breaking of words, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?

In very deed, be it said in deepest reverence, is Christ the first gentleman of Christianity; martyr of misunderstanding, like every other, Death and He are still, despite, his victory, his revelation, the world's great misunderstood; the emblem of one a cross; of the other, a skull. How exquisitely his "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do!" supplements, supplants, Plato's epigram: All sins are of ignorance. Which, I trust, if a very free translation, is at least a legitimate paraphrase, or fair English equivalent, of the most significant word of Greek philosophy.

Any fool can be formal, as can any cad born and bred; but to be fine—that is reserved for the gentleman-scholar. This, at first sound, is a hard saying. But does it really take three or four generations of God-lovers and fearers before the virtues of the fathers are fixed in the children? Are there no second-generation gentlemen? Yea, and first-generation gentlemen—fatherless and motherless gentlemen—gentlemen "sports," unaccountable gentlemen geniuses, the despair of science, the delight of the ages. Money can work wonders! True; but by no manner of means can a cad become a gentleman. Money of a truth talks, saying at the top of its pestiferous vociferous voice: Lo here a gentleman! lo there! But how loud soever it talk, do thou, gentle reader, believe it not.

From the moment of conception we are predestined cads or gentlemen. Then are shut the everlasting gates, then is the doom of doom sealed. Thus decrees the "last of the Fates and the most terrible." The only one of all the gods whose real name we know is indubitably a god of foreordination, deaf, dumb, blind, and feelingless; neither may myrrh, spikenard nor any manner of frankincense make subtle intercession in behalf of the born sinner. This is the awful matter-of-fact; nothing more nor less than physical truth with a vengeance. Are you socially a Saul? Then, nothing short of a journey towards Damascus and a miracle by the way can save you, convert you into a Paul to preach the sainted gospel of quintessential gentleness, the gospel of love that is not puffed up.

Without the scholarship are possibility, promise, but finished gentleness, scarce that. As to the university whence are graduated gentlemen, 'tis no select Rabbinical school for the fortunate firstborn of Levi, neither Oxford nor Cambridge called, nor yet Yale or Harvard, much less California—though this last comes paradoxically closer to it by way of suggestion, it being that larger college whose proper president is Experience, and pupil, Power of Observation, plus singleness, gentleness, of heart.

When the clay, and all that clings thereto or appertains, shall have been laid aside like a garment, then shall stand revealed the true prince, the man among men, but not easily until then. Not without reason did the critical Brunetiere beg us to bear in mind that the rarest things in the world are diamonds and pearls—next to discernment! Than which divinely inspired and free advice God send that no less seasonable or appropriate Christmas present ever fall to your lot or mine!

To be born with the milk-eyed kine for all midwife, and for all cradle, the hay-sweet manger, yet cause your birthplace to be the song of poets, the painted of artists, the adored of saints, after it had been, to begin with, the sought of the wise; to choose fishermen and such for associates, and of the number one for bosom friend, of twelve chosen to be at fault but once, if at all; to go about your and your Father's business afoot, or, on state occasions, on a borrowed ass and her colt; to eat frankly with publicans, to speak fair and without fear the Magdalene by the wayside, the Samaritan woman by the well, and, above all, her whom no man dare stoop to stone; to have a fine scorn for greed and hypocrisy, for the phylacteried Pharisee, the sacrilegious dove-seller, the money-changer out of place; to be able to afford to be poor, careless of dress as field-lilies, contemptuous of kings; to be humble, simple, mild, self-sufficing, self-possessed, detesting the formal and ephemeral, or ignoring them, spontaneously observing and rejoicing in the eternal and fine—that is to be in very deed and truth a gentleman.

To don gentility with a dress suit, only to doff both together in favor of pyjamas or smoking-jacket, is to behave like a ridiculous clown, the incongruity between hide and heart enough to kindle inextinguishable laughter in the grayest of ash-gray Homeric gods.

To be a gentleman is not to be incapable of righteous indignation. Woe to the long-winded milk-and-water hypocrite who tells you the contrary! Heed him not, my son! Suppose the sun should go down upon your wrath, remember that "even the gods have their off-days." In him who is in little or no need of self-loathing, hate of the hateful is the most unselfish thing in the world. It hurts as naught else. Its is the height of misery. By comparison, the cross is kindness. Love of the loveable is ineffable happiness, but to be forced to recognize the existence of the hateworthy, that, I repeat, hurts. It behooves Gentleness itself to warn a generation of vipers of a coming wrath to be fled.

Rare as is the finished gentleman, yet are there more gentlemen born than the fool and the wayfaring man wot of. Myriads die mute-inglorious-Milton-wise, bludgeoned by Chance out of what was intended for gentle existence, filched of their birthright by Circumstance. Many are called to be gentlemen of whom as yet but few are chosen. Happy, easily held though it be, I, for one, can not hold by the doctrine of intellectual aristocracy that, despite the devil, the poet-born will sing, the song all the richer, the truer, by reason of the tongue cut out, the teeth knocked down the throat; that the mere absence of deathless literary remains proves every stammerer to be "in esse" but the would-be immortal, knocking with pitiful impotence at the door of sealed doom. Myself have heard the song's suggestive strangle in the unknown poet's throat, and the bludgeoned gentleman's significant struggle for utterance. Self-expression is, after all, but the proof-positive, the gaping spear-thrust wound demanded of your undiscerning Thomas Didymuses. How many of the formally faithful will not be put to it to recognize the smiling Christ of the Hereafter—minus his crown of thorns? 'Twere not amiss to remember once a year that well-bred cruelty makes a better appearance than blundering gentleness. Blacklead and mother-of-pearl are the commonest things in existence—next to the discernment that discovers the poet after his fame is world-wide. Much more to our credit would be the discovery of the Miltonic mute. He is many, for all his silence. The soul of man is a shell wherein murmurs the music of Eternity. To be convinced of this all one has to do is to put one's ear to it. Nor need the ear have absolute pitch or be in any wise wondrous in its delicacy: music-loving, sympathetic, appreciative of hidden harmonies—no more! Despite Heredity's awful foreordaining, many are the roads to Damascus, miraculous possibilities infinite as God's mercy. Christianity's numerous highways—and they are many as the minds of men—wind uphill, to meet at the apex—how else? True, to Prejudice they seem to be heading for divers and sundry places; but just as sure as all the roads converging lead backward in time to Rome, so sure in time will all the roads lead forward to the hilltop city not made with hands. Yet to the end, for the born Saul will conversion be a cruel thing and

The House of Orchids

By George Sterling

How swift a step from zone to zone!
A moment since, the day
Was cool with winds from linden-bowers flown
And breath of mounded hay
That ripens on the plains,
Beneath the shadow of the western hill;
But here the air is still,
Warm as a Lesbian valley's afternoon
Made langourous with June
And moist with spirits of unnumbered rains,
Pervaded with a perfume that might be
Of rainbow-haunted lands beyond the sea
And ocean-ending sands—
A ghost of fragrance whose elusive hands
Touch not the hidden harp of memory.

What sprites are these that gleam?
Can eyes betray?
Till now I did not deem
That Beauty's flaming hands could shape in bloom
So marvelous and delicate designs.
The vision here that shines
Seems not a fabric of our mortal day
And Nature's tireless loom.
By custom long defiled,
But symbol of a loveliness supreme.
A god's forgotten dream
In alabaster told by elfin skill
In caverns underneath a haunted hill.
Or in some palace of enchantment hewn
From crystal in the twilights of the moon,
Where white Astarte strays
And Echo and the silver-footed fays
Make alien music, fugitive and wild.
Ye seem as flowers exiled,
More beautiful because they die so soon;
But who the gods that could have scorned
Your tenderness unmarred?
Put first ye forth your fragile wings,
Less of the form than of the soul of things,
Where seraphim had mourned
In Eden's evening, heavy-starred,
When first the gates were barred
And cruel Time began?
For mystery hath lordship here, and ye
Seem spirit-flowers born to startle man
With intimations of eternity
And hint of what the flowers of Heaven may be.
Nor can your glamour greatly seem of earth:
Her blossoms are of mirth,
But ye with loveliness can tell of grief—
Unhappy love most exquisite and brief.

Wingèd ye seem and fleet,
Such flowers pale as are Worn by the goddess of a distant star—
Before whose holy eyes
Beauty and evening meet,
Mysterious beauty delicate and strange,
And evening-calm that sighs
With Music's inexpressible surmise—
Her question ere she dies.
From form to form ye range.
From hue to hue,
And this, with petals wan and mystical,
Seems votive to those spirits of the dew
That weep at silvern twilights silently,
With tears that gently fall
On hidden elves dim-curtained by the rose.
And thou, thy chalice better glows
In purple grottos where the stainless sea
On sands inviolable swirls—
On evanescent pearls,
That hold not all thy bosom's purity.
And thou, more white
Than when on some blue lake,
Just as the zephyrs wake,
The ripples flash to light—
Touched by a swan's unsullied breast to foam,
Hadst thou in melancholy halls thy home?
For long ago thou seemest to have slept,
Forlorn, in palace-glooms where queens have wept.
Ah! they too slept at last,
Whose sighs are half the music of the Past!

But thou, O palest one!
Dost seem to scorn the sun.
And, in a tropic, dense,
Lanquid magnificence,
Desire to know thy former place,
Where no man comes at night.
And in its antic flight
Behold the vampire-bat veer off from thee
As from a phantom face,
Or watch Antares' light peer craftily
Down from the dank and moonless sky,
As goblins' eyes might gleam
Or baleful rubies glare,
Muffled in smoke or incense-laden air.
And thou, most weird companion, thou dost seem
Some mottled moth of hell,
That stealthily might fly
To hover there above the carnal bell
Of some black lily, still and venomous,
And poise forever thus.

Chill, in thy drowsy aether warm,
Softly thou gleamest, subtler form;
Witch-bloom thou seem'st to be,
For Lilith would have bound thee in her hair—
Smiling at dusk inscrutably,
And Circe gathered such for gods to wear,
In evenings when the moon,
A sorceress who steals in white
Along the cloudy parapets of night,
In every glade her ghostly pearl hath strewn.
Thou art as violet-wan
As eyelids of a vestal dead and meek.
If after-life can come to blossoms gone,
Surely Persephone
Shall crown her brow with thee,
In realms where burns no star nor sun
To show the dead what amaranths to seek.
And ah—this other! none
Of all thy kin more purely is arrayed—
Pallid as Aphrodite's cheek
To some long passion-swoon betrayed,
By ecstasy foretold;
Yet as with blood thy bosom gleams;
Red as Adonis' wound it seems,
By Syria mourned of old,
Or scarlet lips that drink from bowls of jade,
Slowly, an ivory poison, sweet and cold.

Oh! mystically strange
That speechless things should so have power to hint,
With subtle form and tint
That seize the heart's high memories unaware,
The sorrow and the mystery of Change,
And elements in Fate's controlling plan
Not altogether ministrant to man
Nor mindful of his care—
Some joy to death akin,
Or tragic kiss, or fruit malignly fair,
Some garden built by Sin
For Love to wander in,
Some face whose beauty bids the heart despair!
And yet, O blossoms pure!
How marvelous the lure
Of your fragility and innocence—
This grace and wistfulness of helpless things
That ask no recompense!
Ye give the spirit wings,
For yours the beauty that is near to pain.
And stir the heart again
With visions of the Flowers that abide—
Ah! sweet
As when love's glances meet
Across the music, heard at eventide!

Lloyden, June, 1909.

Christmas Superstitions

While the superstition that the farm animals are gifted with human speech at midnight on Christmas eve is generally known, fewer folk seem to have heard of the similar belief that bees awake from their winter sleep at the same time, and that any one who will listen at the hives may hear them chanting the One Hundredth Psalm: "Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all ye lands. Serve the Lord with gladness; come before his presence with a song."

The legend of the "Christmas Chimes" exists in many countries. If one goes early in the morning to the specified locality and puts his ear to the ground, he will hear church bells ringing deep down under the earth. The tale that is told is of a tremendous earthquake which occurred on Christmas morning centuries ago, when the whole village was swallowed up as the bells were ringing, and ever since they may be heard on the anniversary of the day of disaster. In England this mysterious event is believed to take place in a valley in Nottinghamshire, and formerly it was the custom of the populace of the surrounding district to repair on Christmas morning to listen reverently to the ghostly bells.

Christmastide was the period of the original "Halcyon days." The halcyon (kingfisher) was fabled to build its nest on the waters at this season, and it was popularly believed that the holiness of the period had the effect of a charm on winds and waves, and that the bird could build its nest, deposit its eggs and brood upon them in safety. A still older superstition declared that not only the winds and seas but all animals and plants and every living thing gave evidence of intuitive knowledge of the advent of the anniversary of the birth of Christ and became imbued with the spirit of joy, peace and adoration. At the moment of the advent universal peace reigned throughout the earth and the heavens; silence rested upon the earth, the birds paused in their flight, the cattle ceased to feed, men stood motionless, the stars glittered with added lustre and the sun bounded twice for joy.

The wren is held in special reverence by peasants in many lands, being credited with having made efforts to pluck the crown of thorns from the brow of the crucified Saviour, and it is especially sacred from molestation at Christmastide. In Brittany those mischievous children who hunt the wren in the holidays will be afflicted with pimples, boils, blotches and St. Anthony's fire (erysipelas.) The robin is also held sacred, the tuft of red feathers on its breast being the symbol of the scorching fires of hell endured while the brave little bird attempted to quench them by carrying water in its bill, a drop at a time.

"The robin and the wren
Are God Almighty's cock and hen."

says one old rhyme, while the Scotch youngsters lustily shout:

"Malisons, malisons, mair than ten Gin ye harry the Lady o' Heaven's hen."

"Rumor nights" fall between new and old Christmas, December 24 to January 5. They are full of the sounds of goblins and ghosts, and the cattle are sprinkled with salt, the houses filled with incense and the people asperged with holy water in Styria and the Tyrol. In Styria a corn wreath made from the last sheaf of the harvest is placed in the manger to make the cattle thrive. Elsewhere the Christmas decorations of green are fed to the herd for the same reason.

In Norway and Sweden but particularly in Sweden the peasants strew straw about their houses and churches in the holiday season in commemoration of the circumstance that the Christ Child was laid on a bed of straw. The straw thus used is believed to become possessed of miraculous properties and is gathered up at the end of the festival to be fed to the cattle when they are first turned out to pasture in the spring, as the holy straw will preserve them from sickness or accident. A portion is scattered over the fields at planting time to insure abundant crops.

The French Canadian peasantry relate traditions of miraculous events which occur annually in the native provinces from which they originated but which have no counterparts in the new land. In one locality there is a pyramidal boulder which turns thrice on its base when the priest recites the genealogy of the Saviour at the midnight mass. In another the mountains open and the sea rolls back, displaying all the hidden treasures of the earth. In Franche-Comte the graves open and give up for a brief space the bodies of the departed who, following their deceased pastors, gather about the cemetery cross to recite the prayers of the Nativity, after which, taking a brief glance over the scene of their earthly pilgrimage, they return to sleep.

Some Forms of Philanthropy

It is reported that Mr. John D. Rockefeller gives away large sums of money at this season of the year and derives great happiness from thus making other people happy. This is certainly a very good way to attain happiness. There is no greater happiness than that of communicating happiness, but those who have not the ability to achieve Mr. Rockefeller's high felicity should not for that reason be envious of our richest citizen. There are forms of philanthropy which are within the capacity of men in the humblest walks of life. The noblest philanthropy is that which enriches the soul with impulses and aspirations that have their root in the passion of love, the passion that Christ came upon earth to instil in the hearts of mankind. The philanthropy which Christ preached we can all practice. There is also a negative kind of philanthropy, the practice of which requires not wealth but tact and a large benevolence of soul. We should remember that charity does not consist altogether in the giving of money, and that to be truly philanthropic is to be kind and disposed to increase the volume of joy in the world. Much of the sadness of life is produced by persons who are disagreeable from thoughtlessness. To refrain from being disagreeable is in itself a form of philanthropy. There are some people who see only the discouraging side of life, and who contrive to make everybody they meet uncomfortable. They remind us of things that have gone wrong in times past, they have a disposition to cavil and an aversion to a large and liberal view of things. These people can convert themselves into philanthropists by the simple process of cultivating an agreeable tone and manner, by avoiding unpleasant observations and doleful grimaces and abstaining from scoffing at the triumphs and reducing the enthusiasm of others. If we cannot abound in a flow of pleasantry and good humor, we can at least refrain from giving alarming advice and offensive information. Moreover we can look on the errors of others in sorrow, not in anger, and we can alleviate distress by words of cheer. In short it is possible for the average man to become a joy-maker and develop into a moralist as well as a philanthropist, for joy is the root of morality. There is nothing so demoralizing as gloom; it produces annihilation. If each of us spent some of his time trying to dissipate gloom we should unquestionably succeed in making life more charming and sweet despite its pains and sorrows. If we went about it with a little of the zeal with which some men weave the black drapings of pessimism we might succeed in creating a little of that buoyancy of spirit that defies despair, and develop among all who are barred out from the large possibilities of a life of luxury and restricted to the meagre products of a laborious virtue, an instinctive inclination to sing with the lark in the sky in preference to croaking with the frog in the swamp. There is no finer capital than a propensity to hope and gladness, but the circulation of it is a matter the importance of which we do not appreciate. Were the Government to devote as much attention to this matter as it devotes to the tariff, for example, or as it will devote to President Taft's proposition conducive to pauperism that we should pension all civil service employes, there would soon be more gladness in the land. If instead of devising new checks on individual liberty the Government spent a little time inventing new popular pleasures in furtherance of joy there would be less of the dissatisfaction and discontent that are leading us into social democracy with its innumerable schemes for dragging us all down to one level and a more widespread ambition to rise to higher things. The tendency of government nowadays is to devise ways of persuading us that we are either the product of circumstance or merely the enlargement of a germ. It is one of the unhappy signs of the times that we have come to exalt the kind of philanthropy that John D. Rockefeller practices and to ignore the philanthropy of poets, musicians and painters. There is nothing so beneficial to mankind as the arts that exalt beauty and maintain the dignity and delight of life. Painters, poets and musicians, who, by the way, should be judged by their fidelity to the wholesome errand of joy and their ability to diffuse a mild serenity, are the greatest benefactors of mankind.

Another Idol Mutilated

Political economists are turning their attention to the farmer and inquiring as to whether he is less addicted to offences against the moral code than are the soulless corporations that monopolize industries, control the courts and legislatures and plunder the people. The inquiry so far has been somewhat superficial, but from certain facts that have been brought to light the conclusion seems inevitable that the farmer is not more virtuous than other men. Indeed many instances of his cupidity and worse have been brought to light. It appears that he is not slow to drive a hard bargain or to take improper advantage of technicalities or to avail himself of any of the things by which men exhibit an inclination to do unto others as they would not be done by. These are sad revelations that tend to destroy one of our most cherished illusions. The farmer has always been regarded as a man of the most exalted principles. It was supposed that life on the farm was conducive to high morality, to zeal for fair-dealing and to prejudice against the manners and methods that are engendered in the fierce conflict for supremacy that rages in populous cities. It must be confessed that this notion was in a large measure due to bucolic and pastoral criticism of the ways of the madding crowd. The farmer is always in an attitude of hostility to the city. He regards it as his highest duty to regulate the morals of the city and to purify its politics. The fiercest and most scathing denunciation of our sins comes from agricultural regions, where, it must be inferred, there is no inclination toward the pastimes in which we seek compensation for the ills that are peculiarly metropolitan. But the farmer is not altogether responsible for the notion that he is a person of superior morals. He has been so frequently told so in the impassioned language of city-bred orators that it would be singular if he did not feel that he had reason to point to himself with pride. The sterling worth of the farmer is a theme upon which silver-tongued spellbinders have been rhapsodizing since the days of the Republic's infancy, and from that early period the impression has been widespread that were it not for the civic patriotism that abides in the agricultural districts no kind of statesmanship could keep the nation off the rocks to which all human government is every tending. Hence, to be told at this late day that the farmer we have been worshipping for lo these many years is an idol with feet of clay, is, to say the least, conducive to poignant emotions. Each illusion that goes a-glimmering fills us with sadness. There are few left.

A Moral Issue Petering Out

The indications are that the vexed water question which has been an irritant in municipal affairs for nearly half a century is soon to be eliminated from politics. This is a consummation in itself as desirable as the acquisition of an adequate water supply. The water question is the most venerable of all our moral issues. Innumerable generations of reformers and prophets of public righteousness have qualified for their great mission of civic salvation in the handling of water rates. The politician's attitude toward the water octopus has been the chief test of personal purity. We have elected hundreds of men to the board of supervisors wholly on the strength of their professed prejudice against Spring Valley, and as a result we have fared far from well. In the history of our relations with Spring Valley is to be observed a fine illustration of the stupidity and also the moral obliquity of the dear people. The fixing of water rates being in the nature of a judicial act it is obvious that the men who are sworn to perform that service should act impartially on the evidence submitted to them. But this is not what the people ever expected their servants to do. The people generally pledged their candidates for office to reduce rates. It was as though a judge had been required to announce his decision before hearing the testimony. Under this system pledges were lightly taken and as lightly broken. Of course, the people acting under the guidance of an enlightened and moral press, got precisely what they deserved. Men elected to office for the purpose of doing something immoral for the benefit of the people did not scruple at doing other immoral things for the benefit of themselves. At length we have grown weary of the perennial scandal, and the stockholders of the Spring Valley Company have grown wreary too, and they are eager to sell out and invest their money in some enterprise that is not menaced by the selfish interests of the mob. Apparently there is absolute unanimity on the proposition to purchase the Spring Valley plant. Indeed the proposition has excited so much enthusiasm that even the most vociferous demagogues have become acquiescent, and for the present they are concentrating all their attention on the fight for a municipal railroad.

Cancer Research

George Crocker's death from cancer and his bequest of a large sum of money for the purpose of promoting scientific investigation of the nature of the disease, reminds us once more of its dreadful ravages and of the efforts being made in the interests of mankind to discover the cause and produce a remedy. In England where cancer investigation is being conducted on a larger scale than anywhere else, it was recently reported that of deaths of persons who have attained the age of thirty-five, one in every eight, in the case of women, and one in every eleven in the case of men, are to be attributed to cancer. One can therefore scarcely go anywhere without encountering predestined victims of the disease. But death comes to all of us, and there is some consolation in the knowledge that cancer is eminently a disease of ageing tissues. The experimental method in the investigation of the disease has been brought to great perfection, and the British scientists by recording every detail, and by freely distributing their culture stages, have encouraged widespread research. They have not yet set forth any far-reaching general conclusions, but they have made reports of approximate results. They have reported, for example, that it is unlikely that inheritance or even inherited predisposition plays a part in the incidence of cancer. Owing to the frequency of the disease few large families can escape, and this circumstance has occasioned the notion that, because cases have occurred amongst a patient's kinsmen, there was a family disposition or inheritance. Experiments with many generations of cancerous mice have satisfied the British scientists that the worst possible family history brings with it no susceptibility to the disease. The well-supported theory that cancer is due to the presence of some congenital or embryonic vestige of tissue is also being undermined. Singularly enough many important facts have come to light which tend to bring the scientists back to a theory that was generally accepted many years ago—the theory that cancer is associated with peculiar and very different forms of irritation. With this theory it is impossible to reconcile that of a congenital origin in all cases. Cancer of the skin of the abdomen is almost unknown in the case of Europeans, but is common in Kashmir where the natives habitually irritate the skin of that part of the body by wearing a charcoal oven round the waist. Cancer in the floor of the mouth is rare in European women, but is common in India and Ceylon, where women chew betel-nut and keep a plug in the cheek at the point where the cancer starts. In needlewomen cancer frequently develops in the finger at the site of constant puncturing by the needle. The cancer inquiry is gradually narrowing the possibilities of view as to the essential nature of the disease, and therefore of its mode of onset, its course and treatment, and is providing a vast body of fact against which every new hypothesis that may be suggested can be measured. The results so far point not to the discovery of anti-toxic serum, but towards the possibility of being able to control the growth of cancer, and by following up the mechanism by which mice can be rendered artificially resistant, learning to imitate and reinforce the processes of natural cure.

deliberative assembly of the faculty of refusing to pass the measures submitted to its judgment is to reduce it from a legislative to a consultative body, which practically is annihilation. The purpose of Premier Asquith and his followers is to throw the entire power of legislation into the hands of the House of Commons, or rather of its executive committee, which is called the Cabinet. To carry out this purpose would be nothing short of a revolution. It would be quite as drastic as a change of dynasty, and would probably produce consequences more momentous than those that followed the substitution of William III for James II. The interest that it has for us is that which we derive from contemplating the spread of democracy. It is the passion for democracy which demands that the peers of England be reduced in power beneath the level of the popular assembly.

Little pink pilgrim, till dawn of the day;
Slow swings the cradle, but swift is the flight,
Lullaby, hushaby, baby, good night.

Lies the most wonderful Garden of Dreams;
Short is the journey and soft is the sod

Buttercups beckon and bow as you pass,
Tiny dream-fairies in tunics of blue
Bring sweetest dreams in the garden for you.

Lullaby, hushaby, hasten away
Over the bridges till dawn of the day;
Short is the journey to hours of delight—
Lullaby, hushaby, baby, good night.

The Glimpse

By Arnold Bennett

(Note—Last year the editor of "Black and White" commissioned me to write a story for his Christmas number. I wrote the following story. He expressed a deep personal admiration for it, but said positively that he would not dare to offer it to his readers. I withdrew the story, and gave him instead a comic tale about a dentist. Afterwards I was glad that I had withdrawn the story, for I perceived that its theme could only be treated adequately in a novel. I accordingly wrote the novel, which has been published under the same title.—A. B.)

I

When I was dying I had no fear. I was simply indifferent, partly, no doubt, through exhaustion caused by my long illness. It was a warm evening in August. We ought to have been at Blackpool, of course, but we were in my house in Trafalgar Road, and the tramcars between Hanley and Bursley were shaking the house just as usual. Perhaps not quite as usual; for during my illness I had noticed that a sort of tiredness, a soft, nice feeling, seems to come over everything at sunset of a hot summer's day. This universal change affected even the tramcars, so that they rolled up and down the hill more gently. Or it may have been merely my imagination. Through the open windows I could see, dimly, the smoke of the Cauldon Bar Iron Works slowly crossing the sky in front of the sunset. Margaret sat in my grandfather's oak chair by the gas-stove. There was only Margaret, besides the servant, in the house; the nurse had been obliged to go back to Pirehill Infirmary for the night. I don't know why. Moreover, it didn't matter.

I began running my extraordinarily white fingers along the edge of the sheet. I was doing this quite mechanically when I noticed a look of alarm in Margaret's face, and I vaguely remembered that playing with the edge of the sheet was supposed to be a trick of the dying. So I stopped, more for Margaret's sake than for anything else. I could not move my head much, in fact scarcely at all; hence it was difficult for me to keep my eyes on objects that were not in my line of vision as I lay straight on my pillows. Thus my eyes soon left Margaret's. I forgot her. I thought about nothing. Then she came over to the bed, and looked at me, and I smiled at her, very feebly. She smiled in return. She appeared to me to be exceedingly strong and healthy. Six weeks before I had been the strong and healthy one —I was in my prime, forty, and had a tremendous appetite for business—and I had always regarded her as fragile and delicate; and now she could have crushed me without effort! I had an unreasonable, instinctive feeling of shame at being so weak, compared to her. I knew that I was leaving her badly off; we were both good spenders, and all my spare profits had gone into the manufactory; but I did not trouble about that. I was almost quite callous about that. I thought to myself, in a confused way: "Anyhow I shan't be here to see it, and she'll worry through somehow!" Nor did I object to dying. It may be imagined that I resented death at so early an age, and being cut off in my career, and prevented from getting the full benefit of the new china-firing oven that I had patented. Not at all! It may be imagined that I was preoccupied with a future life, and thinking that possibly we had given up going to chapel without sufficient reason. No! I just lay there, submitting like a person without will or desires to the nursing of my wife, which was all of it accurately timed by the clock.

I just lay there and watched the gradual changing of the sky, and, faintly, heard clocks striking and the quiet swish of my wife's dress. Once my ear would have caught the ticking of our black marble clock on the mantelpiece; but not now—it was lost to me. I watched the gradual changing of the sky, until the blue of the sky had darkened so that the blackness of the smoke was merged in it. But to the left there appeared a faint reddish glare, which showed where the furnaces were; this glare had been invisible in daylight. I watched all that, and I waited patiently for the last trace of silver to vanish from a high part of the sky above where the sunset had been—and it would not. I would shut my eyes for an age, and then open them again, and the silver was always in the sky. The cars kept rumbling up the hill and bumping down the hill. And there was still that soft, languid feeling over everything. And all the heat of the day remained. Sometimes a waft of hot air moved the white curtains. Margaret ate something off a plate. The servant stole in. Margaret gave a gesture as though to indicate that I was asleep. But I was not asleep. The servant went off. Twice I restrained my thin, moist hands from playing with the edge of the sheet. Then I closed my eyes with a kind of definite closing, as if finally admitting that I was too exhausted to keep them open.

II.

Difficult to describe my next conscious sensations, when I found I was not in the bed! I have never described them before. You will understand why I've never described them to my wife. I meant never to describe them to anyone. But as you came all the way from London, Mr. Myers, and seem to understand all this sort of thing, I've made up my mind to tell you, for what it's worth. Yes, what you say about the difficulty of sticking to the exact truth is quite correct. I feel it. Still, I don't think I over-flatter myself in saying that I am a more than ordinarily truthful man.

Well, I was looking at the bed. I was not in the bed. I can't be precisely sure where I was standing, but I think it was between the two windows, half behind the crimson curtains. Anyhow, I must have been near the windows, or I couldn't have seen the foot of the bed and the couch that is there. I could most distinctly hear Cauldon Church clock, more than two miles away, strike two. I was cold. Margaret was leaning over the bed, and staring at a face that lay on the pillows. At first it did not occur to me that this face on the pillows was my face. I had to reason out that fact. When I had reasoned it out I tried to speak to Margaret and tell her that she was making a mistake, gazing at that thing there on the pillows, and that the real one was standing in the cold by the windows. I could not speak. Then I tried to attract her attention in other ways; but I could do nothing. Once she turned sharply, as if startled, and looked straight at me. I strove more frantically than ever to make signs to her; but no, I could not. Seemingly, she did not see.

Then I thought: "I'm dead! This is being dead! I've died!"

Margaret ran to the dressing-table, and picked up her hand-mirror. She rubbed it carefully on the counterpane, and then held it to the mouth and nostrils of that face on the pillows, and then examined it under the gas. She was very agitated; the whole of her demeanor had changed; I scarcely recognized her. I could not help thinking that she was mad. She put down the mirror, glanced at the clock, even glanced out of the window (she was much closer to me than I am now to you), and then flew back to the bed. She seized the scissors that were hanging from her girdle, and cut a hole in the top pillow, and drew from it a flock of down, which she care-

The Year's Work of California Writers

By Sarah Connell

There has been nothing remarkable in the literary production of California during the year 1908. Few of the books brought out are destined for more than a temporary popularity, and no new writers of note have sprung into view. Early in the year we were informed of the intention of Joaquin Miller to establish a colony of poets at the Heights, and after Jack London's ill health forced him to abandon his voyage it was reported that he, too, was going in for intensive literary farming at Glen Ellen. Perhaps it is too early to look for crop returns yet, but up to the present writing there has been no notable effect on the market. Mrs. Carolan's Persian poet, Mirza Ali Kuhli Khan, spoke in such glowing terms of the already established colony at Carmel that real estate prices began to soar at once and fortunate owners looked out in the morning expecting to find the Tree of Knowelge in full bloom on their lawns, but as yet, climate has done less for the literary colonists than hard work and inspiration accomplishes less than old fashioned stick-to-it-iveness. Mrs. Alice McGowan and Grace McGowan Cooke, formerly members of Upton Sinclair's Helicon Hall experiment, are late additions, and Mr. Sinclair himself was a sojourner during the early part of the year, when some of his plays were being sumptuously staged. The dramatic productions were not successful from a financial view point and the author, who has since complained bitterly of our abominable climate, where it rained in winter, shook the dust—or the mud—from his feet and betook himself to Michigan. Gertrude Atherton spent the greater part of the year in California, a large part of the time on the summit of Tamalpais, where she was at work on her new book which will be one of Macmillan's early spring productions. From time to time she launched forth in the daily papers on the subject of culturines and their behavior at public entertainments, but it is doubtful whether her drastic and much needed scathings will have any effect on those who called them forth. Frederick Stimson (J. S. of Dale), Frederick Isham, George Ade, Jacob A. Riis, S. S. McClure and John Burroughs were amongst other temporary sojourners, and Miriam Michelson came home to lend a hand in our political troubles. Her novel, "Michael Thwaite's Wife," dealt with the question of the hour, a reformer, but as yet Miss Michelson has produced nothing to satisfy the promise held forth by her earliest work.

The Irwins, all three of them, were in evidence. The "Letters of a Japanese Schoolboy," the work of Wallace Irwin, has been hailed as one of the greatest feats of humor ever produced and sustained, not excepting even Peter Findley Dunn's "Dooley." Mrs. Grace Luce Irwin's "Dairy of a Show Girl" received the recognition which it demanded, while Will Irwin's realistic "Confessions of a Con Man" is an addition to the literature of roguery. Gellett Burgess, whose name links itself naturally with that of the Irwins, gave us "Lady Mechante," which, however, is not to be placed on the same shelf as his "Heart Line" of two years ago. Hermann Whittaker's "Planter" is easily the best work of any Californian, unless a possible exception is found in Mr. London's "Martin Eden," but except for the one fact that they are both to be classified as fiction, there is nothing else in common between them on which to base a comparison. Mr. Whittaker's novel is the outcome of his sojourn in Mexico and deals with the experience of a rubber planter and the horrible conditions of the virtual slavery under which the industry is carried on. Mr. London's story comes so near to being a recital of his own biography during the years of his upward struggle that his detractors have been sadly hampered in dealing with it. They have been unable to point out the impossibilities and absurdities of the narrative because the author is in a position to refute them in his own person. Mr. London has contributed a number of short stories to the magazines, the results of his sojourn amongst the South Sea islands. Another good story of earlier days in San Francisco, "Behind the Closed Door," was the work of Miss Lucia Chamberlain, whose improvement, since her first production, "The Blue Moon," in collaboration with her sister, Miss Esther, is marked and steady. Miss Esther died at the close of last year.

A complete new edition of Ambrose Bierce's works was issued but at a price which recalls the famous saying of some author, that his own works were too expensive for him to afford. It is not that one would place a limit on the value of a book but sometimes there are other considerations than the desire of possession to be thought of. "Write it Right" is a late production of this author, a treatise on the use of words and if a familiarity with its contents could be made an enforced requisite for every writer, English literature and language would be the gainer. A new edition of Joaquin Miller's poems may have had something to do with the theatrical posings of their creator, since anything is legitimate in these days of self-advertisement. John Muir's dog story, "Stickeen," made its appeal to the few, Grace McGowan Cook's pen has been kept busy with stories of the Tennessee mountaineers, E. W. Townsend, whom we still claim as Californian, published one book, "The Climbers," and George Sterling's much-discussed "Wine of Wizardry" came out in book form.

The Portola Carnival was seized upon as the psychological moment of its queen, Miss Vergilia Bogue, for launching her "Strength to Yield," and as it has achieved the distinction of being condemned by club women and sequestrated in the public libraries of the cow counties, there is reason to expect that its successor will find ready acceptance as a best-seller. Kate Douglas Wiggin has been busy with the dramatization of her "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," the best girl's book since "Little Women." The play, which includes the events related in the "New Chronicles of Rebecca," has been put together under the joint labor of the author and Miss Charlotte Thompson, and the reception accorded to it on its appearance gives hope that the drama is as good as the book. "Susanna and Sue," a story of the Shakers, is Mrs. Wiggin's contribution to the year's literary output.

Will Irwin put us under obligations to him in collecting a few of the remaining short stories left by Frank Norris, into a volume under the title "The Third Circle." Being amongst the earliest productions of that lamented author, it was not to be expected that they would add new laurels to his fame, but his unknown friends, the readers, are only too well pleased to have the fragments gathered up to be laid away in the rosemary of remembrance.

James Hopper's "Trimming of Goosie" seems to be a light bit of fluff and featherdown, as far as possible from the gruesome "9009" of last year. The mention of Mr. Hopper's name recalls that curious entanglement in his nationality revealed when he had occasion to apply for a passport to France, and discovered the possibility of his being liable for military duty because of his French birth and unnaturalized American residence.

It was reported as early as last winter that Edward Greenway was contemplating the publication of his memoirs, and society was agog and apprehensive in con-

UNION SQUARE SAN FRANCISCO

Once More---The Palace Hotel

By James King Steele

Since the opening of the Palace Hotel in 1875 when, under orders from William Sharon "no expense was spared to make it the best house in the world," it has occupied a peculiar position. Here on the western shore of the continent, it was the last place of American comfort which the outgoing traveler enjoyed. In like manner it was the first place of welcome for the one returning from foreign shores. Because it held this unique position and maintained it for years by a constantly better service and equipment, the news of the burning of the Palace came as a blow to thousands scattered over the world. Here in San Francisco, and in fact throughout the entire coast, the Palace was for years the center of things social, political, industrial and financial. Here the political victories of the early days were planned, careers started and ended and vast industrial enterprises launched. Here the men who had made millions gathered and enjoyed themselves, as did other pleasure seekers from every land.

THE GENIUS OF THE PALACE

John C. Kirkpatrick, manager of the new hostelry, is one of the most noted Bonifaces in the world, for he has entertained the famous men of all countries in the years during which he has presided over the Palace.

When the Palace Hotel opened in 1875 there were 275 names on its register the first night, the first being that of Leland Stanford. Warren Leland, one of the Leland brothers who had been noted the country over for their hotels, was the manager, having been brought out by Mr. Ralston from Long Branch, N. J., where he was operating the Ocean House. The erection of the Palace Hotel was due to William Ralston who owned the land on the corner and decided to build the hotel there. The land was valued at $400,000 and when the hotel was completed it represented an investment of $1,000,000, being one of the largest in the country. It had 850 rooms and 437 bath rooms—at that time an unprecedented number. An early account of the first dinner given in the Palace brings out most of the names prominent in the city's history. I quote from one who was present at that auspicious opening:

"The first party to enter the dining room at the first formal dinner at the Palace was Charles Crocker, accompanied by his wife and daughter, Hattie (married to C. B. Alexander of New York in 1888), and two of his sons, Will and George. Then came General John F. Miller and Mrs. Miller, with their son and daughter (now the wife of Captain Richardson Clover, U. S. N.) Others who registered at the Palace as permanent boarders and were seated at the first dinner were Mr. and Mrs. A. N. Towne and daughter Eva (now Mrs. Clinton E. Worden), and Miss Hattie Mansfield, a sister of Mrs. Towne, who afterwards married a well-to-do merchant of San Francisco; Mr. and Mrs. T. F. Goodman and Mr. and Mrs. John Corning.

"Among the first permanent boarders at the Palace were Mr. and Mrs. Charles Main who for twenty-two years had a fine suite of rooms on the third floor on Market; Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. McDermott; Nicholas Luning, the capitalist, son and two daughters; Drury Melone and wife, the latter the eldest daughter of Woodward of Woodward Gardens, and a strikingly fine looking woman; Mr. and Mrs. Frederick L. THE PRIDE OF THE CITY

This view of the Palace gives an excellent idea of the graceful architectural lines on which the new hotel has been constructed.

twice beaten for Governor; Mr. and Mrs. Howard Coit (the latter the dashing Lillie Hitchcock); Dr. and Mrs. Hitchcock; Admiral McDougall and his famously beautiful daughter Nopie, now Mrs. LeBreton of Washington, D. C.; Mr. and Mrs. Edgar Mills and daughter; General and Mrs. Barnes and their two sons; Judge and Mrs. Sawyer; Trainor W. Park, the president of the Panama Railroad; General J. F. Houghton and his two very pretty daughters and many others not so readily remembered, nor so well known.

"I lived at the Palace twelve years—from 1878 to 1890—and call to mind many of the permanent boarders of those days. There were Senator and Mrs. Hager and their two sons and two little girls—the eldest son being Frank Hicks, the popular clubman of this city; Albert Jenckes, the artist, and his wife and two of his daughters, the younger one, Nellie Trowbridge, now the wife of Walter Newhall of Los Angeles; Charlie Sontag and his very showy and cultivated wife; "Sandy" Austin, city treasurer, who became a defaulter and killed himself; a handsome broker and his handsome wife named Marks; a professional gambler named Taylor, a man of excellent manners and good habits, with his wife and five children sat near the door.

"One of the jolliest tables in the room was made so by the presence regularly at dinner of Paymasters of the Navy Cockran and Wood and Paydirector James Fulton who in 1879 married Miss Belle Mallard of this city. At another table were Mr. and Mrs. Lucien Hermann, he a straight, tall and elderly Creole, an unreconstructed rebel, but very fond of our army and navy officers, and one of the most charming men I have ever met. At this table also sat Mr. and Mrs. Beverly Tucker of Virginia—the Beverly Tucker for whom our Government offered a reward of $100,000 after the war, but who was really no better nor worse than Lee or Longstreet.

"Next to Mr. and Mrs. Herman's table were Mr. and Mrs. W. Chapman and daughter, the young lady who in 1884 married Jesse, the youngest son of General Grant. In the middle of the room sat one of the brevet wives of the muchly-married Sewing Machine Singer, and her four daughters and son, all very good looking, well mannered and well educated and rich; two of the daughters married English noblemen, two are dead and the handsome boy went to Monte Carlo and in a single evening won 400,000 francs and the next week lost it all and then killed himself. Old Josiah Belden and Mrs. Belden and their son and two daughters, formerly of San Jose, lived at the Palace for many years. So did Judge and Mrs. Ross and their son, and also Justice Stephen M. Field and Mrs. Field, when not in Washington.

"But what a multitude of great and distinguished people the Palace has housed during the past thirty years. Generals Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Howard, McClellan, Schofield and Miles, Longstreet, Joe

THE GOLDEN BALL ROOM

In this exquisite ball room of the new hotel the great social affairs of San Francisco are destined to take place. The picture is designed to show the decorative scheme of the ceiling.

THE LARGEST RANGE IN THE WORLD

This view of the Palace kitchen shows the ranges, fifty feet long, over which fifty cooks will preside in order that guests may be supplied with every conceivable dainty that their palates demand.

Johnson, Gordon, Wheeler and Fitzhugh Lee, Presidents Hayes, Harrison and Roosevelt, Morgan of Alabama, Frye of Maine, Joe Brown of Georgia, Fenton of New York, and hundreds of other senators and congressmen; Dana and Amos Cummings of the Sun, Pulitzer of the World, Jones of the Times and Reid of the Tribune, Medill of the Chicago Tribune, Crosby Noyes of the Washington Star, James Gordon Bennett and scores of other distinguished journalists; George Augustus Sala, George Alfred Townsend, Beecher, Talmage, Moody, Henry Irving, Booth, Barrett, Patti, Proctor, De Lesseps, Stevenson, James, Kipling, Hawthorne, Haggard, Melba, Jeremiah Black, Andy Curtin, C. P. Huntington, George Gould, Harriman, Hill, Fish, and thousands of others.

"There were often at one time, from 1875 to 1885, 800 permanent guests at the Palace, and among them many very pretty girls. Miss Dora Miller was fair and sweet looking, and her chum, Miss Mary Eddy, was extremely chic and vivacious; both were daughters of army officers and both married navy officers. Miss Nellie Wood was a petite brunette and considered by many the prettiest girl in San Francisco. The Misses Houghton were very pretty, and the younger divided honors with Miss Aileen Ivers, one of the most bewitching maids in California. One of the Belden girls was considered quite pretty, and Miss Towne and Miss Chapman had many admirers. Flora Sharon was a perfect rosebud, and her dearest friend, Bessie Sedgwick, (now the beautiful Mrs. Thos. Dargie), had a most attractive face and manner. Miss Chamberlain was a stately blonde and created a sensation in London as an American beauty. Miss Nettie Tubbs was also stately and beautiful, and became the wife of Lieutenant Oyster. The youngest of the Singer girls was a perfect blonde and remarkably sweet looking and pretty. Nellie Trowbridge was extremely witty and otherwise attractive and full of mirth. Miss Estee was a bit thoughtful looking, prettily plain, with fine eyes and mouth. Miss Peters was chubby and pretty. But in my opinion the most beautiful girl of all was Miss Schmiedell, tall and straight as a spear, with lovely eyes and hair and the carriage of a youthful queen. A number of these Palace maids are grandmothers now!"

The present Palace is built on the same general lines as the old hotel. Its Central Court 140 feet by 88 feet, is still the great feature. This court, however, instead of extending the full eight stories as before has its great domed roof of leaded glass brought down to the third floor level. This makes every room in the house an outside room—a vast improvement over the former arrangement. Another slight departure from the old plan is the arrangement of the dinning places—the men's grill is to the north of the Central Court, the main restaurant is on the south side, with the banquet room on the south side of it. The ball room—a superb golden room of the Louis XVI period—is in the old place on Jesse and Annie streets, with its own separate carriage entrance as before.

Along the Jesse street side are small banquet rooms, ladies' parlors, reception and dressing rooms. Another department for ladies' use is the reception room and gallery on the second floor overlooking the court at the east end and the ladies' parlor on the New Montgomery street side.

The main restaurant is a stately apartment in a wonderful shade of gray and gold. Its cheery carpet and upholsteries and white napery make a pleasing picture.

The men's grill is a room of vast size and splendid arching ceiling with the electric grill and coal ranges at the west end.

The kitchens are marvels of efficiency and convenience and are located, as before, along the Annie street side. No other hotel in the world has so complete an arrangement. In most of the hotels and cafes the kitchens are located down stairs, or far away from the dining rooms, but Colonel Kirkpatrick insisted that these should be as they are, and this fact is the continued guarantee of the excellence of the Palace Hotel service, which has been famous for thirty years in two hemispheres.

The Palace has 700 rooms and 670 bath rooms. On the second, seventh and eighth floors are located the "royal suites" which present the highest examples of elegance and luxury in hotel life. These apartments have from four to ten connecting rooms, consisting of reception salon, dining rooms, parlors, bed rooms, etc. They are beautifully decorated and richly furnished and present the acme of modern hotel luxury.

Two Poems in Prose

By Charles Baudelaire

WHAT IS TRUTH?

I once knew a certain Benedicta whose presence filled the air with the ideal and whose eyes spread abroad the desire of grandeur, of beauty, of glory, and of all that makes man believe in immortality.

But this miraculous maiden was too beautiful for long life, so she died soon after I knew her first, and it was I myself who entombed her, upon a day when spring swung her censer even in the burial-ground. It was I myself who entombed her, fast closed in a coffin of perfumed wood, as uncorruptible as the coffers of India.

And, as my eyes rested upon the spot where my treasure lay hidden, I became suddenly aware of a little being who singularly resembled the dead; and who, stamping the newly-turned earth with a curious and hysterical violence, burst into laughter, and said: "It is I, the true Benedicta! It is I, the notorious drab! As the punishment of your folly and blindness you shall love me as I truly am."

But I, furious, replied: "No!" The better to emphaise my refusal I struck the ground so violently with my foot that my leg was thrust up to the knee in the recent grave, and I, like a wolf in a trap, was caught perhaps for ever in the Grave of the Ideal.

THE MARKSMAN

As the carriage traversed the wood he bade the driver draw up in the neighborhood of a shooting gallery, saying that he would like to have a few shots to kill time. Is not the slaying of the monster Time the most ordinary and legitimate occupation of man? So he gallantly offered his hand to his dear, adorable, and execrable wife; the mysterious woman to whom he owed so many pleasures, so many pains, and perhaps also a great part of his genius.

Several bullets went wide of the proposed mark, one of them flew far into the heavens, and as the charming creature laughed deliriously, mocking the clumsiness of her husband, he turned to her brusquely and said: "Observe that doll yonder, to the right with its nose in the air, and with so haughty an appearance. Very well, dear angel, 'I will imagine to myself that it is you!'"

He closed both eyes and pulled the trigger. The doll was neatly decapitated.

Then, bending towards his dear, adorable, and execrable wife, his inevitable and pitiless muse, he kissed her respectfully upon the hand, and added, "Ah, dear angel, how I thank you for my skill!"

The Spectator

The Reticence of McCarthy

Since his election to office Mr. P. H. McCarthy has made a record for taciturnity, which is all the more remarkable in his case inasmuch as he has a talent for oratory. Orators are usually loquacious. The average orator has an ear greedy for the sound of his own voice, but Mr. McCarthy seems to have developed a taste for the eloquence of discretion, which is silence. Except on one or two occasions of a public nature, when, in response to an invitation to contribute to a postprandial flow of soul, he gave utterance to a few glittering and satisfying generalities, his tongue so far as the public knows, has shown no disposition to become wanton or luxuriate. So far as political patronage is concerned he has enveloped himself in an impenetrable cloak of silence, and at this writing the newspapers have not been able to get so much as a hint as to the policy he is pursuing in the selection of an official family. Apparently the persons—if any there are—that have been taken into his confidence, are as successful as himself at emulating the oyster. But the Mayor-elect has not been so studiously averse to discussing his policies as newspaper readers have reason to believe. One night recently he outlined one of his policies with frankness and considerable emphasis, and while doing so he commanded the undivided attention of his hearers upon whom he made a very deep impression. The policy outlined on that occasion has reference to the newspapers, which is probably the reason why the newspapers have not seen fit to give it publicity.

A Popular Policy

Mr. McCarthy's enunciation of his policy in regard to the press was unpremeditated, but it was nevertheless forceful and edifying. It was made at an impromptu symposium which was held at a late hour on the night of the opening of the Palace Hotel. After withdrawing from the celebration of that notable event the Mayor-elect joined some prominent citizens who were engaged in talking it over. In this little coterie the press was represented. While the intellectual graces were expanding themselves colloquially, a casual remark that came to the surface in the eddies of conversation incited Mr. McCarthy to a discussion of newspapers, and he gave utterance to some sentiments indicative of a spirit of independence that is not to be subdued by the usual methods employed by the dailies when engaged in dictating the policies of public officials. The Mayor-elect announced that it was his intention to conduct municipal affairs according to his own lights, and to have not the slightest regard for the whims or interests of those newspapers whose editorial policies are shaped in the business office. He intimated moreover that he was prepared to exact fair treatment from the press. A tentative demurrer was interposed to some of Mr. McCarthy's epigrammatic observations touching the relation between pocket and principle, but it was overruled and the objectionable observations were amplified, supplemented and illustrated with pertinent instances so pat and so far beyond contradiction that no effort was made to join issue. At the close of the discussion it was the censensus of opinion that so far as his newspaper policy is concerned the new Mayor has adopted a wise and popular principle.

The Struggle For a Chairmanship

There are three candidates for the chairmanship of the finance committee of the incoming Board of Supervisors, and the contest is attracting a deal of attention because it is believed that the outcome will be a matter of considerable significance. The three candidates are Loughery, Kelly and Nelson. Loughery has the backing of Michael Casey, and Nelson, it is believed, is grooming for the job under the auspices of the Mayor-elect, while Kelly, who is President of the Labor Council, is depending on his own personal influence. There is no expectation of a clash between McCarthy and Casey, for they are on the most cordial terms, but in the event of Casey's man winning out the conclusion will be drawn that he is to be vouchsafed prodigious power under the new dispensation. During McCarthy's term the Board of Public Works, of which Casey is President, will handle an immense lot of patronage, and if in the distribution of it nothing occurs to damp the ardor of existing friendships experienced politicians will be greatly surprised.

The History of Fire and Earthquake

Professor Henry Morse Stephens' "History of the Fire and Earthquake" is a work that ought to excite a great deal of interest. It will doubtless be accepted as the only truthful and accurate history of the events with which Professor Stephens deals, for in a sense it is an official record of what happened in April, 1906, and of what was done by the commitees that had charge of the work of relieving distress and bringing order out of chaos. Aside from the importance of the work as an historical production, it is of value as a literary performance, for Professor Stephens is a man of rare literary ability. He is no writer of slapdash history; nor does he content himself with the dry as dust tabulation of facts. He abominates hackwork. He exhibits a scholarship remarkably comprehensive in its range, and a style that flows pleasantly and never jars. In all his work there is ingenuity of analysis and an imaginative sympathy with ideas which gives it the unmistakable stamp of quality. With him plan and execution are perfect, and one cannot but admire the sharply delineated and vivid representation of what he chooses to represent. Unquestionably the demand for "The History of Fire and Earthquake" will be so large that the book will run through many editions; that is, if it ever comes out, for be it known this is not a review of the work. The fact is the work has not yet appeared. It has been on the point of appearing several times ever since the spring of 1907, and consequently keen expectation has suffered frequent disappointment. The cause of the delay? That is something beyond my power of enlightenment; but as I have said Professor Stephens is no writer of slapdash history. He is devoted to the secluded life of pure research, and research is slow work. Since starting his history Professor Stephens has dashed off a beautiful grove play for the Bohemian Club, but writing a drama is child's play compared with writing the melancholy history of our disaster and the thrilling history of the part played in subsequent events by some of our leading citizens. It is said in explanation of Professor Stephens' apparent slowness that he has had a most difficult time trying to verify reports of the great achievements of some of the little gentlemen who think they did all that was worth doing, but who ought to consider themselves very lucky if he has succeeded in putting a coat of whitewash over their performances in connection with the distribution of the Relief Fund. Professor Stephens is now in Europe. Where the book so full of promise is to be found nobody knows.

Mrs. Atherton's New Novel

The novel on which Gertrude Atherton was engaged during her recent stay in this city will be called "Tower of Ivory." The novelist's choice of this title was made after many others had been tried and found wanting. It gained her approval, I am told, simply because it embodied what might be called a spiritual motif underlying the romance which she has written. The story has to do with the career of a great singer but aside from that nothing can be told, as Mrs. Atherton guards the secret of her themes very closely. When Mrs. Atherton was entertaining Miss Maude Fay here a ridiculous story got about that the beautiful and talented San Francisco girl was the heroine of her novel. This bit of gossip was very distasteful both to Mrs. Atherton and to Miss Fay and they both denied it most emphatically.

A Memory of Senator Sharon

Happening into the Press Club the other day I met Captain "Billy" Barnes there and asked him if he remembered the opening of the old Palace Hotel, for I knew that he had attended the famous inaugural dinner with his father, General W. H. L. Barnes. Captain Barnes said that he was too young at the time to be properly impressed with the affair, but he has a recollection of living at the old Grand and watching the masons at work on the walls of the Palace. The captain said that he still retained a vivid memory of Senator Sharon and particularly of one rencounter with him. It was in the Palace court where Senator Sharon was shuffling along in the Arctic footgear which he was compelled to wear because his fatal malady made it impossible for him to walk in ordinary shoes. "Senator," said young Barnes, "you are not looking well today." "And I am not feeling well, either," replied the senator; "I have just lost the last pleasure in life. Dropped $2500 in a poker game with Mackay and the rest of the crowd a little while ago and don't feel the least regret about my loss."

A New One About Daniel Webster

Captain Barnes has earned the distinction of being the best raconteur of the newspapermen's club and he vindicates his right to that proud honor whenever he is in reminiscent mood. For instance, he told me a story about Daniel Webster which has never been published, although the biographers and memoir writers have covered the ground with unusual thoroughness. As a youngster General Barnes, the father of Captain Barnes, was a clerk in the law office of Charles O'Connor, the brilliant Irish lawyer who was at the top of his profession in New York in those great old days. One afternoon O'Connor who had just been retained in an important case, called young Barnes into his sanctum and said: "Mr. Barnes, take this check for $1,000 to the New York Hotel, find Mr. Daniel Webster and ask him to accept it as his retaining fee in such-and-such a case." A fee of $1.000 was an enormous one in those simpler times and Barnes departed for lower Broadway to the historic New York Hotel with proper appreciation of the importance of his errand. He found the great statesman in his usual position at the bar, drew him aside, presented the check and explained the nature of the case. Webster examined the check with a Jovian frown, folded it and tucked it into his waistcoat pocket, saying: "Very well, young man, inform Mr. O'Connor that I shall appear in this case." No sooner had Barnes returned to the office than O'Connor told him that the case had been compromised and sent him back to the hotel to inform Webster that his services would not be necessary and also to recover the check. Webster was still at the bar when young Barnes returned and allowed the lad to interrupt his potations long enough to explain the new aspect of matters. He was silent until Barnes asked for the check; then slowly drawing it from his pocket, unfolding it and studying it for a moment, he said: "Tell Mr. O'Connor that in the circumstances I will charge no further fee." With an impressive wave of the hand he repocketed the check and the incident was closed.

The Authorship of "Fate"

A subscriber writes to this paper to inquire the authorship of the poem "Fate" which was published in Town Talk last week by request. That is a difficult question. I would as soon attempt to settle the question of the authorship of "Hurrah For The Next That Dies," "Laugh And The World Laughs With You" or the Letters of Junius as to speak with authority on this subject. "Fate" is such a beautiful poem that many people have thought that it was just the sort of thing of which they were capable and they have accordingly affixed their names to it. For instance, it was published in the scholarly and carefully edited Saturday Review of London for January 18, 1908, over the name of one G. E.

Edmundson. Under his name appeared "Bucamaranga, 1907," giving the impression that Mr. Edmundson composed this masterpiece in that far-off South American city some time during the year preceding its publication. Of course the poem was written long before 1907 and it looks as though Mr. Edmundson was either hoaxing or buncoing the scholarly and carefully edited weekly aforesaid.

Milton Royle's Opinion in the Matter

Several years ago Edwin Milton Royle, before "The Squaw Man" and other plays had made him wealthy and internationally famous, appeared in vaudeville in a sketch of his own writing called "Friends" in the course of which he recited this poem of "Fate." He played "Friends" at the Orpheum, by the way, giving Ashton Stevens a chance to proclaim his great talent for playwriting long before other dramatic critics paid much attention to him. The poem was published on the vaudeville program with a note from Royle expressing his thanks to the unknown author for the opportunity of using it. The last time I met Royle I asked him if he had ever discovered the authorship. He smiled and told me that he had been swamped with letters from claimants, but he added that as nearly as he could determine, the best claim was that of Mrs. Susan Marr Spalding. That of course was before Mr. Edmundson had claimed the poem by contributing it to the Saturday Review of London. All I can add is that the New York Times' query editor has on several occasions attributed the poem to Mrs. Spalding. If any reader can throw light on the subject I will be glad to place the columns of Town Talk at his disposal.

A Suggestion for the Exposition People

The fact that Dr. Rupert Blue is about to leave this city on a four months' leave of absence and that the military authorities may find work for him to do thereafter which will keep him away from this city for several years reminds me that I have a suggestion to make to the men who are laying the plans for the great exposition to be held here on the completion of the Panama Canal. Every world's fair needs a director of sanitation; why should not San Francisco put in a bid for the services of Dr. Blue for that position? Of course there will be a medical director who will undoubtedly be a local physician competent to handle that department of the exposition work; but the director of sanitation should be a man of national fame who has gathered experience in coping with sanitary problems in various parts of the country. I believe that Dr. Blue is just the man for the place. He was the director of sanitation at the Jamestown Exposition of 1907 and made a record there of the most enviable kind. The dangers which confronted the exposition people in Jamestown lurked in the menace of malaria, typhoid and smallpox and all of these dread diseases were effectively prevented by the masterly precautions adopted by Dr. Blue. Owing to the shortage of funds Dr. Blue was not provided with an adequate staff of assistants and had to do most of the field and office work himself; yet no executive function was more thoroughly performed or won such hearty praise. It will be remembered that Dr. Blue came from Jamestown directly to San Francisco to take charge of the plague situation and it is a matter of history how efficiently he cleaned up this city. As a result of his work this city is today regarded by sanitation experts as the cleanest in the world. I don't imagine that Dr. Blue would be very eager to tackle another job like that of Jamestown, but if the proper representations were made I am pretty sure that he might be induced to come here for the work. There are several big sanitation problems before Congress and Dr. Blue will be assigned to some of them, without doubt, so the directors of our exposition should put in a bid for his services in 1915 without delay.

Suspicious Bankers

"Today I had the queerest experience of my whole career as a bank employe," a well-known banking clerk said to me last Thursday, the day after the opening banquet of the Palace Hotel "Some time ago friends of mine came to me and insisted that I be present at the opening banquet at the Palace. I did not want to go, because I am not very fond of banquets and besides I really could not afford to pay the big fee. But I allowed myself to be dragooned into attending. This morning my name appeared in the list of those present and before noon the officials of the bank had an expert at work on my books."

Do you know what Quality means in a Turkish Cigarette? If not get a box of "MILO." Then, any other cigarette, and try same, side by side. You'll note the delicate, aromatic mildness of the "MILO." Mildness (yet with the richness in flavor) is what costs in Turkish Tobacco, and its just this that makes the Perfect Cigarette. You'll find it in No Other.

THE SURBRUG COMPANY, New York City

The Whine of a Barnstormer

Another actor-r has discovered that San Francisco is a jay town. Wright Lorimer is his name. He is the pet of one-night stands from the heart of the Middle West to the sundown rim of this glorious continent. Mr. Lorimer came to San Francisco to introduce to us what he calls "a play with an uplift," a play entitled "The Shepherd King." This play was received with great enthusiasm everywhere within the circumference of the Chautauqua Circle, but here in San Francisco where there is not much of the sweetness and but faint flickers of the light that Matthew Arnold deemed essential to a high civilization, "The Shepherd King" excited not half the interest that has been excited from time to time by kings of the turf and kings of the opium ring and kings of the tenderloin and other monarchs indigenous to the home of democracy and popular at prices ranging from ten to fifty cents. Mr. Lorimer, I suspect, made the mistake of putting too high an appraisement on his royal puppet. "The Shepherd King" was not seen for less than a quarter and the highest priced seats were $1.50. Theatregoers balked, and Mr. Lorimer sulked and waxed indignant, and on the last night of the show, after disposing of the big Philistine, the actor, quitting the role of Shepherd King appeared before the audience in his own propria persona and chided the people of San Francisco on their lack of taste and their abominable prejudice against plays that uplift. Now as I have never seen Mr. Lorimer's play I am not competent to judge whether the actor was justified in censuring us for failing to overflow the theatre and put money in his purse, but I will suggest that perhaps the reason of my failure to go to the show was the same that deterred others. My reason was that Mr. Lorimer placarded the town with bills which set forth the dictum of one William J. Bryan to the effect that "No greater play than 'The Shepherd King' had been written since 'Ben Hur.'" From these bills I drew two inferences; first, that Mr. Lorimer regarded Mr. Bryan as a competent dramatic critic; secondly, that he regarded "Ben Hur" as a great play. Everybody who knows anything about drama knows that "Ben Hur" was one of the worst pieces of claptrap that was ever put on the stage. Knowing something about the drama I concluded that Mr. Lorimer who believes that no higher praise could be given to his play than to compare it with "Ben Hur," was peddling through the country something that was hardly worth while. In all the circumstances of the matter it is intensely amusing to hear of this barnstormer setting himself up as an apostle of culture.

Director-General of the Fair

Already there are many candidates for the post of director-general of the Panama Canal Exposition. M. H. De Young has not announced himself as a candidate, but I hear there is a good deal of sentiment in his favor on account of his signal success in the management of the Midwinter Fair. He certainly exhibited exceptional executive genius in organizing that exposition. He conceived the idea of holding that fair and he inspired all the enthusiasm that attended it. James McNab's friends are in favor of him for director-general, and though he is not ambitious of the honors of the office, his friends are already conducting a vigorous campaign in his behalf.

McKee Rankin Sues Nance O'Neil

Nance O'Neil is having a hard struggle to free herself from the meshes of the law. Process servers have dogged her footsteps for years and if she dreamed that the winning of her suit against the Shuberts would end her days in court she was very much mistaken. This time it is her old manager, McKee Rankin, who has brought suit against the beautiful tragedienne. When the courts liberated her from the Shuberts Nance joined the forces of David Belasco, but now comes Rankin with the assertion that he has a prior claim on her services and the law will be invoked once more. Rankin has retained the redoubtable Colonel Kowalsky to represent him and true to his usual method, the colonel has been hinting to the newspapermen of sensational developments which will startle New York when the case comes to trial. I do not put much stock in the colonel's dark insinuations. Rankin and Miss O'Neil may fall out over the interpretation of a contract but I hardly think that there will be any recriminations of a personal kind. If there should be, I will be greatly disappointed in both of them.

Why General Barry Smiles

General Thomas S. Barry is one of the happiest men in San Francisco and his happiness has nothing whatever to do with matters of military achievement. It is the sort of cheerful feeling which comes of knowing that the passing of years has not dimmed the memory which he left behind. Fifteen years ago General Barry, then a captain of infantry, was stationed in San Francisco and was one of the choice spirits of the Bohemian Club. The other day he went to the club in company of a couple of friends and gravitated quite naturally to the bar. "Do you still serve the Barry cocktail?" he asked the mixologist who presided at that shrine of bohemianism. The functionary smiled a ready assent and concocted the tempting drink which had been named in honor of Captain Barry more than a decade ago. Is it any wonder that the general is happy?

A Poet and His Mentor

To Herman Scheffauer has come the rare distinction of having a volume of verse dedicated to him. It is a rare distinction for two reasons: Scheffauer is a poet and also he is a young poet. It is not usual for poets to dedicate their poems to poets; nor is it usual for a poet who wishes to dedicate his poems to a child of the muses to select one who has not risen to a towering height in the world of literature. When Goldsmith dedicated one of his plays to Sam Johnson Bozzy's idol was universally recognized as England's dean of letters, and the author of "She Stoops to Conquer" felt that he had done himself more honor than he could possibly do to the great oracle. Almost everywhere that we find a work of literature dedicated to a man of letters, the person to whom the compliment was paid towered above his contemporaries. The poet who has dedicated his poems to Herman Scheffauer is no mean versifier. He has written many lines that have a good deal of genuine poetic feeling, but also a good deal of the mocking fluency of phrase and metre which lures us to the verge, it would seem of poetry, only to confront us with a void. Whether from the consciousness of his limitations or through sheer modesty, this poet veils his identity with the initials "H. B. S." As he has entitled his volume of verse "Arrows of Adolescence," it is to be inferred that he is a young man, but this inference I should draw had they come from the press under any other title, for his poems have many of the echoes of Baudelaire and Swinburne that appeal especially to very young men who have persuaded themselves that they have sounded all the depths of the passion of love. "H. B. S." is a frank young man. He tells us that all his poems are "the authentic outcome of temperamental efferverscence." "God or the Devil rioted in me," he says, "and the writing of verses provides an outlet at once simpler and more subtly drastic than any other." As to his modesty I seem to be filled with doubt when I read: "This innate spontaneity will, I think, be corroborated by the general style of the verse, which is at times so swept away by the swing of its own impetuosity as to be somewhat callous of the claims of the smooth polish of a perfect technique; qualities are thus manifested which are susceptible of the name of ruggedness or harshness, according to the character of the individual verse and the individual critic and which the benevolent will call richness and the malicious turgidity." All this is naive and characteristic of self-confidence. It is interesting to know that this poet claims Herman Scheffauer as "my dear friend and poetical mentor." He addresses him as follows:

Oft our sorrows we would interchange,
Arm in arm through London in the night,
Through the present, past, and future range—
What we'd do, and win, and love, and write;

Naked we would strip the heart and mind,
Measure fibres, test the pounding blood,
Sing each baffling nymph for whom we pined.
Prate about the true, the great, the good:

You, my hero, highly picturesque,
Reasoned ever with your Titan soul,
I would love most blandly from my desk,
Lashing logic to a flying goal.

So these oats of wild and headlong art
Bring their fruit of somewhat purple grain,
To the poet of the grandiose heart,
From the poet of the restless brain.

Some Arrows

Being short on space I cannot give my readers many specimens of this poet's workmanship. I can only inform them that he calls on Messalina to thrill him with her magic, assuring her that Narcissns, nor Claudius, Nestor, Sitius nor Valens shall "quench the insolent furnace" of their bliss; that he assures her that her body was her "immortal harp" which was "Attuned to the immortal song of love, a song so warm it melted virtue's wax, burning the bonds of wisdom," etc., and that he apostrophized her infidelity as something to be not less proud of than the mercenary spirit which prompted her to hawk her beauty in the mart of flesh, for to her coin was "the gold of love." There are some powerful and striking lines in this poem. For example Messalina is addressed as "Thou bowl insatiate of the wine of life." The poet in his preface tells us that this poem has all the foaming violence of a mental debauch. The poet is his own critic and by means of his preface enables us to understand his purpose which is "to build up the two spheres of the human world, for it is intellect and sex that constitute the breath of existence and the blood of life."

Pollok's Judgment

Supervisor Pollok is of the opinion that what the United Railroads needs is a change of management. It is singular that Mr. Pollok should regard himself as a competent judge of such matters. He has had a lot of experience as a manager, but the volume of it has been due apparently to a lack of appreciation on the part of those by whom he was employed. Even now he is about to lose an official job because of the dissatisfaction of the people with the kind of service that has been rendered by the official body of which he is a member. That body has spent a lot of its time harassing the officials of the United Railroads, and, as a consequence, impairing the service rendered by that corporation. What is mostly needed in this city at present is a change of government, and that we are about to get. It will be too bad if about the same time the people do not make emphatic their disapproval of the municipal ownership scheme with which we are now threatened, and which if it be adopted will unquestionably result in creating the impression abroad that we are incorrigible. We are supposed to be eager to propitiate eastern capital, but the eastern capitalist is not hunting for investments in cities that have become addicted to municipal ownership.

The Cabinet

With the Cabinet back in the Palace Hotel, Mine Host Kirkpatrick doubtless feels that his cup of joy is filled to the brim, for the Cabinet completes the list of essentials of which the atmosphere of the famous hotel is compounded. It now remains for the Cabinet to signalize its return to its old haunts with a banquet. Indeed it remains for the Cabinet, which is the only body that truly represents the divers tints, crotchets and characteristics of San Francisco's cosmopolitanism to strike the keynote of the new era of harmony that has just dawned upon us with blinding effulgence. In the Cabinet are men that direct affairs of State; men that make politics and unmake politicians; men that guide the destinies of financial institutions; men that animate and vitalize the institutions of our country; men that mitigate with epigrams the oppressive seriousness of life; lawyers that keep the bar from degenerating and doctors that keep the medical profession from stagnating. In short the Cabinet is composed of men that do things, thereby affording a strong contrast to the Commonwealth Club which is composed of men that merely deliberate and resolute. There is no problem that is not solved offhand by the Cabinet—none save the problem of a pretext for a banquet. Many suggestions have been made and all have been rejected. When it was proposed to make Postmaster Fiske the motif of a banquet in recognition of his refusal of a Cabinet position on the ground that while he loved Washington, San Francisco was his affinity, it was thought that the problem was solved. But it is still pending, Fiske having demurred out of modesty and an overwhelming reluctance to enter the limelight.

That Gridiron Dinner

Some of my newspaper friends who have worked in Washington and absorbed some of the journalistic traditions there objected to my slighting reference last week to the annual Gridiron Dinner. They said that I had not done justice to the Washington correspondents. Well, let us see. I have a detailed report of the dinner before me and find that one of the big hits of the evening was the song:

> We love, we love, we love Roosevelt,
> But oh, you Taft.
> He's gone away to Africa,
> But oh, you Taft
> He said he would come back again
> And thereupon we laughed
> We love, we love, we love Roosevelt,
> But oh, you Taft

Now I maintain that that is a mighty poor parody and that it would not get a hearing in the Press Club of this city; it lacks "class." "Class" is the quality which one thinks of instinctively in reading of the Gridiron Dinner—it was so conspicuous by its absence. Two candidates for admission to the club posed as Cook and Peary and wrangled over their discoveries; members made up to represent Ballinger and Pinchot, Joe Cannon and Herbert Parsons, etc., were announced for boxing matches; orders were sent to the kitchen for various dishes such as "the Roosevelt Policies," "One Uncle Joe" and so on. Suffragettes broke into the banquet room but fled when the toastmaster threatened to feed them through stomach pumps. If these diversions appeal to anybody as embodying rare wit or delicious humor, I am away off in my judgment. To me they seem about on a par with the sort of doings that convulse the groundlings at a native sons' low jinks.

Merely a Reminder

The Hon. James D. Phelan has forgotten something of which I conceive it to be my duty to remind him. He has forgotten that he is a member of the Board of Trustees of the Free Library. I am persuaded of this lapse of memory on the part of our most repudiate citizen by the circumstance of his resignation from the Park Commission in anticipation of the McCarthy cleaver. It is natural to suppose that while in the melancholy mood of separating himself from his dearly beloved public service he would have abandoned the Free Library to its fate had he remembered his official connection therewith. It is barely possible that Mr. Phelan has suffered no lapse of memory in this matter; that he did not resign from the Free Library board because he is under the delusion that as a trustee he is in the nature of an irremovable barnacle, but if so his mind is likely to be purged long before he finds himself in Maxim's merry throng. Mr. Phelan, by the way, is going to Europe with a view to being recalled from as long a distance as possible. He is still under the impression that his potentialities as a saviour are illimitable.

Lucky Mr. Johnson

In the Call of Tuesday I read that a default judgment had been rendered against the city and in favor of G. E. McCrea, an architect, for $2,677. The suit was based on a claim that had been rejected both by the Board of Education and the Board of Supervisors. How did it happen that the city authorities failed to oppose this suit? The Call explains that though the complaint had been served on the indefatigable civic patriot and censor of morals, Mayor Taylor, the City Attorney was never notified of the suit. This explanation is not satisfying. How are we to account for the remissness of the whiskered gentleman who lisps in numbers and halts in verse? When Mayor Taylor labors in the service of his darling Muse it is because he has received inspiration. Are we to suppose that even his inertia when he is in the service of the people is also the result of an inspiration, the inspiration that is born of an ardent friendship. Let us hope not. But one is inclined to be fearful of the cynics who may take notice of the fact that the attorney for the man who obtained judgment by default against the city was the highly esteemed civic patriot, the Hon. Hire-Him Johnson. During the last few years Mr. Johnson has seemed to be a perpetual inspiration to public officials as well as a joy to his clients. His patriotism if not its own reward has at least brought him wonderful luck. Besides a fee from Mr. Spreckels, he has had the valuable indulgence of Mr. Langdon in criminal cases, and now we find one of his clients profiting by the neglect of Poet Taylor. Mr. Johnson's friends have reason to rejoice in his good fortune, and his enemies can wish him nothing worse than a eulogy from Judge Dunne.

Too Many Santa Clauses

Santa Claus is a beloved institution but it strikes me that we have seen too much of him during the present holiday season. He has been in evidence on every block of Market street from Third and Kearny to Seventh and Jones and some blocks have had several of him. Now this is too much of a good thing. What chance have the children to believe in Santa Claus when they see him three in a row in front of a department store? I wonder what answer mothers have ready when the youngsters ask how many Santa Clauses there are? It would not be so bad if these multitudinous Santa Clauses were worthy representatives of the fine old gentleman; but they are not. In most instances they have very red noses and a beery look in the eyes and are far from clean. I do not understand how mothers can allow some of these Santa Clauses to kiss their children. The absurdity of the situation is illustrated in the evening when these furred and bearded impersonators in awkward squad formation march up Market street to their headquarters. If I were a child and saw that procession my belief in Santa Claus would die the death.

Mumm Scores a Victory

That was a terrific engagement which the embattled wine agents fought last week at the portals of the new Palace. Never did knights of old, struggling for possession of some donjon keep, lambaste one another as lustily as the agents of the vintages in their fight for recognition at the Palace opening. This hand-to-hand encounter in the Battle of Fizzwater was a stubborn and a bitter contest and fearsome were the casualties thereof. But when the noise of the popping of corks had died away and the rattle of clashing ice buckets was hushed, it was found that Sir Ned Greenway had copped the honors of the fray. Depending less on endurance than on diplomacy Sir Ned had captured the hotel while his enemies still fought outside and Mumm reigned as the king of wines at the Palace banquet on Wednesday night and at the opening dinner of Thursday.

Telephones Indicate Growth

There is nothing more conclusive of the growth of San Francisco than the records of the Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Company showing as they do a large and steady increase in the demand for telephones. This company's system has greatly expanded since the fire. It has put into service several thousand more phones than were in use before April, 1906, and new subscribers are coming in every day. This expansion of business is not to be attributed altogether to improvement in service, although to everybody the improvement has been obvious. No public service corporation ever made a better record for generous attention to the wants of the people. This record has been due in no small measure to the fidelity of employes, the cultivation of which is the policy of the leading officials of the company. Nobody ever hears nowadays of the discourtesy of a telephone operator, though in former years it was the constant cause of complaint. Under the present management the hello girls receive a great deal of encouragement. Their burdens have been lightened and they are allowed to take a vacation on pay. The whole telephone service has been revolutionized since Mr. E. C. Bradley took charge. Mr. Bradley was formerly connected with the Postal Telegraph Company in New York. He is one of the executors of George Crocker's will

The Latest Irish Bulls

Gilbert Chesterton says that the Irish make bulls for the same reason that the Pope issues them, a statement which only an Irishman or a British Hibernian like Chesterton can understand. But while the Pope continues at intervals to issue bulls, there are those who ignorantly think that the Irish have ceased to make them and for their benefit I am going to quote two which are brand-new. Tay Pay O'Connor addressed a meeting in Boston recently and in the course of his speech described a famous division in the House of Commons. With that ghost of a rich brogue which distinguishes him, he said: "The Tories wint out into the right hand lobby and the Liberals wint out into the lift hand lobby, and whin the House was intirely impty only the fifty Irish mimbers remained." That is a very good specimen of an Irish bull and so is the remark of a recent Lord Mayor of Dublin who said: "The exact truth about Ireland is that the country is overrun by absentee landlords."

Organist Eaton is Honored

One of the rarest distinctions in American musical circles was conferred on Louis H. Eaton, the organist of Trinity Episcopal Church, last week when he was elected a colleague of the American Guild of Organists. Musicians alone will appreciate what high honor this is. As far as I know, Wallace Sabin is the only other member of the guild in this city. Eaton's election is more than ordinarily complimentary because of the three classes of members of the guild, the fellows and associates must qualify for membership by a rigorous ex-

Solving the Waiter Problem

Those who cannot dine at home or in their clubs as often as they would like to and who have exhausted all the other expedients for assuring good service on the part of waiters, might try the method of an ingenious New York man. A friend of mine who has just returned from New York went to dinner with this man in one of the big metropolitan hotels. When they sat down the New Yorker stripped a five dollar bill from a fat roll and proceeded to cut it in half. His friend asked the reason. "Well, you see," was the reply, "I always do this when I have to stay for a few days in a hotel or when I have to dine or lunch for a time at some restaurant or cafe. I find a waiter who looks promising and give him half of the bill. I tell him that if he takes good care of me I will give him the other half when I leave. I have never yet failed to get good service by this method and my idea of good service is stricter than that of most men."

Another Bust Controversy

Apropos McTavish's interesting article in last week's Town Talk regarding the much-discussed wax bust which the Kaiser has pronounced an undoubted masterpiece of Leonardo da Vinci but which English experts insist to be the work of Richard Cockle Lucas, an artist friend reminds me of similar controversy which arrayed art sharps in ranks of bitter opposition in the middle of the last century. Although many famous artists were deceived by that bust, it was finally found to be a forgery, like the tiara of Saitapharnes. According to my artist friend, Giovanni Costa, the great Italian painter, during his stay in Florence in 1863 with his friend and brother artist, Cristiano Banti, unearthed a colored terra cotta bust in a dirty little charcoal shop. It had all the appearance of being the work of one of the great artists of the Quattrocento and after careful examination Costa and Banti bought it between them for $2,000. All the great artists and connoisseurs in Florence went to see it. Dupre, perhaps the greatest sculptor of modern Italy, was enthusiastic about it. He pronounced it a masterpiece of fifteenth century art and opined that it might be an early work of Michelangelo or of Luca Della Robbia. Lord Leighton was equally enthusiastic. Costa was anxious to have the Italian government or the city of Florence buy the bust to preserve it for Italy, but the matter hung fire for several years and after a while there arose rumors that the work was a modern forgery. The result was that Costa obtained a confession from one Bastianini who admitted having modeled the bust and completely proved his story. Great was the chagrin of the experts.

Social Prattle

By TANTALUS

Ladies in the Palace Bar

None of the daily papers, in their splashing accounts of the opening of the Palace, mentioned that the real christening took place in the bar room. It was nip and tuck between the society crowd and the outsiders to be in at the real killing, and the woman or girl who failed to rest her prettily slippered feet on the rail of the bar and her bare elbows on the marble as she participated in the baptismal of the Palace, was deprived of participation in the real ceremonial that will go down in history as the opening of the new hostelry. To mention the names of those who were there would be to include just about everyone of the smart set crowd as well as the celebrities of the social world from Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, Seattle and so on. They were all there and many of them did not leave until daylight. Few left before two or three. Talk about the return of the "old San Francisco spirit." It simply cavorted and avalanched in its mad joy. The festivities beginning with the dinner parties on Thursday night continued uninterruptedly for at least three days. The crowd of men and women was so jammed in the bar room at one time that a certain fashionable young matron lost her beautiful braid of French blonde hair. It was real convent hair too, the most expensive of all, and must have cost not a cent less than $50. I saw her earlier in the evening, the braid encircling her trim little head, each twist held in place with a shell pin, a treacherous clasp, by the way.

MISS SUZANNE KIRKPATRICK

Mrs. Flood's Original Gown

There seems no exhausting the capacity of the fashionable wardrobes of the haut ton of San Francisco. Night after night the grand dames of the millionaire set appear in fresh plumage, wearing costly gowns with as much indifference as their mothers wore their calico wrappers just a few years ago. At the last Greenway ball one of the most oddly original gowns was that worn by Mrs. James Flood who revels in masterpieces from the shops of the modistes. She wore a plain white satin princess, close fitting and very ample as to train and fulness about the feet. Over this simple affair were draped two black scarfs woven with tiny bits of hammered silver of Syrian workmanship, similar to the scarfs worn everywhere on all dressy occasions. But those draped over Mrs. Flood's gown were exquisitely elaborate, the silver standing out against the black in beautiful contrast. They were draped flat, like the chasuble of a priest, with the sides slightly held together by bands of the silvered net. The thing was daringly simple and in that maze of elaborate gowns one was struck with its wonderful beauty.

Too Tired to Dance

The second Assembly Ball at the Fairmont was unique in many ways. Saving the debutantes, everyone was too tired from the Palace frolic of the night before to dance. The girls, to keep warm, danced by themselves in the dressing rooms, and it was not until after supper that the crowd really took the ball in earnest. The music was fine, but except for half a dozen couples, no attention whatever was paid to the orchestra. Many left after the supper, too worn out to keep up a pretense. "I guess the goose that laid the golden egg was killed at the Palace last night," remarked Greenway, viewing the deserted ball room. But after supper all was different, probably because it was a tip-top supper. A magnificent diamond and pearl necklace was lost and for an hour or so it was in the keeping of the clerk at the desk of the Fairmont, everyone wondering to whom it could belong. During the supper an excited young woman called at the office to identify the bauble, and when it was presented to her, she looked so absurdly relieved and pleased that everyone who witnessed the episode joined in her rejoicing.

The Moribund Sunday Tea

The passing of the Sunday tea has been noted in London and at the rate at which such accidents of progress send their influence abroad another season or two may sound its local doom. It was not a long lived institution but it was a grateful one that served to introduce a note of informality into the heavy and somewhat provincial atmosphere which prevailed in the middle era of San Francisco's social history. Ten years ago it was a daring innovation. I believe the Ames girls were the first in San Francisco to hostess a Sunday tea at their hospitable home in Taylor street. Both Bessie Ames and her sister Alice who is now Mrs. Robbins of Boston, were musical and their first revolutionary function was described as a musicale. For some reason music was supposed to elevate the Sunday function above the week-day level of entertainments given solely for amusement. Later other progressive hostesses plunged boldly into the new idea and in spite of protesting sermons from fashionable pulpits the Sunday tea became a settled institution. Among the pioneers were Mrs. Jimmie Robinson, Mrs. Jack Casserly and the Tobins. In London it has died of neglect, the week-end house-party being responsible, and since many of our hostesses also have country homes and are given to week-end entertaining the San Francisco Sunday tea may soon, perforce, be abandoned.

The Crocker Garden

The grounds of the new William H. Crocker place at Burlingame are the most elaborate and attractive on the peninsula and I am told that no European landscape gardener is responsible for their beauty. The gardens were laid out after designs made by Bruce Porter of this city whose talents have heretofore been devoted to painting and stained glass window designing. Mr. Porter spent much time going over the site and studying the architect's plans, with the result that the imposing mansion has a suitable and beautiful setting. The natural charm of the surroundings has not been eliminated, as in the gardens of one millionaire resident of San Mateo who has achieved an effect of a city park with a totally extraneous Italian garden attached. The approach to the Crocker residence is by a broad drive-way that sweeps gracefully to an entrance guarded by ten massive marble pillars. The house is of cement and has fifty rooms, one of which is a handsome ball-room where society may see some brilliant functions in the debutante days of Miss Mary Ethel Crocker.

Miss Newhall's Contretemps

Miss Marian Newhall is telling an amusing story at her own expense. Be it known that this interesting young lady, among other attractions, possesses a beautiful head of curly hair which makes it unnecessary for her to wear the ever-changing false locks of capricious fashion. One day recently she was going for a motor ride with a prominent young chap, who, by the way, has been paying her marked attentions. Her pretty new hat did not exactly suit her, so she deftly pinned on some false curls which had the effect of making the costly creation quite fetching. Speeding through the park, the conversation turned on the present style of head dress. Miss Newhall was as vehement as her admiring chauffeur in condemning the extravagant modes and the conversation was as exemplary as it was spirited. But, unfortunately, in the midst of it, a sudden gust of wind caught Miss Newhall's hat and bore it away. The false curls went with it. Stopping the car the gallant chauffeur sprinted down the boulevard, captured hat and curls and returned them to Miss Newhall without the ghost of a smile.

Blingum Was Not Represented

Baroness Uchida, the wife of the Japanese Ambassador, made a most favorable impression on the ladies who had the good fortune to meet her at the reception given in her honor at the Fairmont. She is a graduate of Bryn Mawr and the women of the Collegiate Alumnae of this city saw to it that she was accorded all the honor one in her position merited. The reception, while not a large one, was attended by a score of women, most of them identified with the larger activities of the city. There was Mrs. Henry Payot, Mrs. Francis M. Wright, Mrs. Julius Kahn and Dr. Carolyn Rosenberg. Strange to relate, one saw not a single fashionable from Burlingame. The society crowd, were they to be depended upon to express the hospitality of San Francisco at such times, would, it is feared, be obliged to send their "regrets."

The Cinderella Dance

In all the animated chatter over the present "social war," so called, with its feature of five exclusive dancing clubs and a bewildering array of patronesses, the Cinderellas have "laid low," so to speak. Now they come forward to announce that they will give but one ball during the season and, having made the announcement, relapse again into dignified silence, content that they have supplied a fresh impetus for gossip. While the polite rivalry that exists is in no sense war, it is true that the conservative twenty who make up the Cinderella patronesses are averse to anything that savors of fighting and the widespread discussion of the situation with its conflicting reports of a conspiracy to depose Czar Greenway, has been most distasteful to them; wherefore they have agreed among themselves to retire gracefully, giving one ball to prove there is no ill feeling. The first dance of a series had been planned for December 30, but when the idea of a series was abandoned and a single function of unrivaled brilliancy was decided upon, the date was changed to January 6, the scene to be laid at the Palace. "The Cinderellas" was originally a club for the younger set, which came into being five years ago and gave a series of jolly dances at Cotillon Hall. The idea then was to supplement the Greenway Assemblies with early hour dances for the young, and the name was chosen because festivities ceased and lights went out promptly at 12 o'clock. In its renaissant state, however, early hours will not be observed, and the younger set is not considered. The patronesses are chiefly of the "Menlo set' as distinguished from the "Burlingame set" which sponsors the nameless dances at the St. Francis. They are Mrs. Edward Eyre, Mrs. Percy Moore, Miss Jane Flood, Mrs. Harry Babcock, Mrs. William Tubbs, Mrs. Francis Carolan, Mrs. Charles Page, Mrs. Gerald Rathbone, Mrs. Willis Polk, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. George Boyd, Mrs. John Kittle, Mrs. William Tevis, Mrs. Thomas Breeze, Mrs. Truxton Beale, Mrs. John Brice, Mrs. William Bourn and Mrs. W. L. Elkins Jr. Mrs. Joseph Donohoe and Viscomtesse de Tristan are also patronesses but being in mourning their names do not appear on the invitations.

The Mob Cap Coiffure

As the veracious chronicler of all things down-to-date I find it necessary to record the approach of a new coiffure recently devised by a French artist and even now finding its way to popularity in New York. No doubt it will find its way to this city soon and as it has the advantage of eliminating puffs and curls to such an extent that only a very small part of the coif need be false, it should be very popular, even with those to whom it will not be becoming. To be technical, this new coiffure of severe simplicity is called the mob cap because the hair is arranged like the old-time mob cap. To effect this the hair is drawn loosely in a line with the roots, so that it has a fluffy smoothness, the ends being tucked under in such a manner that they do not show. The fewest possible number of hair-pins are used, these cleverly concealed. The hair-dressers, I am told, have anticipated requirements for this style so successfully that a woman possessing only scanty locks of her own may cover them with one of these coifs entire. One manipulation shows a soft coil binding the hair above the forehead, a few stray strands being carelessly drawn in front of it. The original arrangement was accomplished by parting the hair down the middle, then drawing it down over the ears in an uncompromising line, or by turning it back below the eye-line. In either case the ears are entirely concealed, when the long drop earrings are particularly desirable adjuncts.

The Wright-Campbell Wedding

All arrangements are about perfected for the wedding of Miss Marian Wright, second daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Kirkham Wright, and Henry C. Campbell. The ceremony will take place Wednesday, January 12, at the handsome home of the bride's parents, 2504 Scott street at 4 p. m. Pink will be the prevailing color. Mrs. Edward Torney, the beautiful sister of the bride, formerly Miss Jeanette Wright, will be the matron of honor. Miss Nina Curry, an intimate friend of the bride, will be the bridesmaid. Both matron of honor and bridesmaid will wear exquisite pink robes. The bride's gown of rich cream satin will be trimmed with rare lace which was worn by her grandmother on her wedding day, and was worn by her mother and sister on their wedding days also. Little Miss Louise Langley, a cousin of the bride, and Henry Rixford, nephew of the groom, son of Dr. and Mrs. Edward Rixford, will be the ribbon bearers. Mr. Campbell had desired his brother Alexander Campbell who resides in the East to attend as best man but owing to business reasons it will be impossible. As yet

Dropped Hubby's Cigarettes

My compliments to the charming young society woman who conquered an awkward situation with dignity the other day. Stepping down from a bootblack's stand she dropped her purse and out rolled her husband's cigarette case. The cigarettes were scattered over the sidewalk. Some men from the Bohemian Club were passing and assisted the young woman in gathering together her treasures. She thanked them with perfect poise and went her way with serene self-possession.

An Old Rumor Revived

Mrs. James A. Robinson chaperoned a merry party of young people to Santa Barbara last week. It was a jolly little jaunt much enjoyed by Miss Marian Newhall, Miss Helene Robinson and others who were invited. The party made use of William F. Herrin's private car. This fact has been sufficient to revive the old rumor of a romance which, it has been prophesied, may result in a marriage between Mrs. Robinson and Mr. Herrin.

Sanford Lewald Scores

It was characteristic of the wife-awake energy of Sanford Lewald to capture the honor of holding the first ball in the new Palace for his Entre Nous cotillon. Lewald is a cotillon leader who does not torture his nightly pillow with uneasy dreams of social exclusiveness. Not for him the haughty limitations within which other leaders are wont to restrict their pampered dancers. I have frequently noted that the young ladies of the Entre Nous, as pictured in the papers, have no reason to fear comparison with the beauties of the Greenway set; and I have not the least doubt that their dances are very enjoyable affairs. I congratulate Lewald and his followers on the distinction which they have won of being the first to trip the light fantastic in the new hostelry. They have made a bit of dancing history.

Christmas in the Clubs

The Christmas Jinks of the Bohemian Club will take place Wednesday evening, December 29, when a Christmas Pantomine will be given. Porter Garnett is the author and incidental music has been arranged by Herman Perlet. Vail Bakewell will sing "Noel," the old French carol which Donald de V. Graham first introduced into the club's annual festivities. There will also be a tree with suitable gifts for the members, but since their suitability may not be fully appreciated by the recipients the identity of Santa Claus is being carefully guarded. In other years the late "Uncle" George Bromley was a genial Santa Claus whose kindly wit added much to the success of the ceremony. The Press Club will have its Christmas Jinks on Tuesday night. Captain Barnes will be the Santa Claus of the newspapermen and will distribute appropriate gifts. An unusual feature of this celebration will be the reading by "Jack" Wilson, with dramatic accompaniments, of Dickens' Christmas Carol. The Family Club held its Christmas Jinks Wednesday night and in the words of the rural editor "a good time was had by all." Frank Moroney was the "mother-in-law," which means that he managed the affair.

A Word or So About "The Man From Home"

By Edward F. O'Day

Remembering "Mr. Hopkinson," I wondered how "The Man from Home" would go in England. It is a tempting subject for lazy holiday season meditation. Approach it ruthlessly, dogmatically, and you are sure to spoil it. If you are an Anglophobe or an Anglomaniac, please keep out of this discussion, for in this week of holly and good wishes and street-corner Santa Clauses we desire to hold our blessed tempers in control, to speak softly and carry a branch of mistletoe. You and I, gentle reader, being neither Anglophobes nor Anglomaniacs but broadminded Anglo-Saxon and Celt, with a sympathy nicely balanced between Bunker Hill and Agincourt, between the evils of the tariff and the merits of the budget, are eminently qualified to loaf a little over this question. Well then, what do you think? How would "The Man from Home" go in England? Being an Anglo-Saxon you probably know better than my Celtic self how well or ill the Indiana school of literature is known in the little kingdom overseas. Not very well known? you say. That's a pity. I must confess that I myself do not keep as constantly abreast of our literary advances as I might. I am not exactly au courant with the Indiana movement in novels and plays, but I think it is a thoroughly healthy movement. What you would call vulgarly healthy? Well, perhaps so, but don't you think that vulgar health is immeasurably superior to polished sickliness? that Ade and McCutcheon and the rest of the hoosiers boast a soundness of wind and limb, so to speak, of which certain English literary ladies and gentlemen ought to be honestly envious? You are a little doubtful. Well, let that pass. You will agree with me, I am sure, that Booth Tarkington represents the Indiana school at its best. That being so, would England accept him? would England stand for "The Man from Home"? Let us see. We know that England stood for Mr. Carton when he wrote "Mr. Hopkinson" and it strikes me that we can trace a family likeness between the Englishmen of "The Man from Home" and the Englishmen of "Mr. Hopkinson." What of it? What difference does it make? Only this, that it seems to me important to ascertain whether the Englishmen of "The Man from Home" are fundamentally true. If they are not, the play is not worth bothering about. So we may as well compare Booth Tarkington's Englishmen with Mr. Carton's Englishmen, admittedly drawn by one who knows. In "Mr. Hopkinson," you remember, we saw a duke who was willing to sell his niece to a bounder, odious as he was rich, and who was content that his duchess should enjoy the society of her cavalier servente so long as she left him free to pursue his own amours. We saw a lord who had been co-respondent in a nasty divorce and who had "bolted" with divers married women. We saw a young chap entitled to call himself "honorable" who while playing the part of cavalier servente to the duchess, lived off the wealthy bounder and plotted wth the family to marry him to the niece, fully expecting that her marriage would cloak her intrigue with the "bolting" lord. We saw—but my dear Anglo-Saxon friend, you know just as well as I all the sordid vicious things we saw. You say they were merely hinted at? Hinted is not exactly the word; I admit that they were not flaunted in our faces but they were very deftly and surely suggested, none the less. Now what has Tarkington done? There is the Earl of Hawcastle—he "bolted" with another's wife and a large sum of money belonging to neither and he is willing to let his mistress marry an American youth for what there is in it. Both he and his sister, Lady Creech, are eager to capture an American heiress for his empty-pated son. When they are pinched in their bargaining they are quite willing to send an innocent man to prison for harboring an unhappy fugitive. Candidly, who has been more severe with the English, Tarkington or Carton? You may have your choice and welcome. But Carton did not hold any Americans up to scorn, you say? He stuck to his own countrymen? Very true, but I fail to see where Tarkington has been over kind to his own countrymen. Patriotism did not prevent him from depicting a pair of intolerable young snobs in the American Granger-Simpsons, brother and sister. There are ugly little traits in the characters of those two that should make most Americans wince. He held the mirror up to me once or twice and to be perfectly honest, my dear Anglo-Saxon, didn't you glimpse a little of yourself? You didn't? Well, then you're a better man than I am or else a less candid one. Of course the two plays are radically different in their leading characters. Mr. Hopkinson exposes the sordidness of the life into which he is being initiated by his servile readiness to imitate its ways in so far as his mean nature will permit him. The Man from Home accomplishes the same dramatic end by his steady resistance to the evil influences which surround him. He sees the sham and the rottenness of it with perfect clarity of vision. He makes the comments on that life which must rise to the lips of the English when they see "Mr. Hopkinson" performed. You are right, his comments are very stinging, but I do not think that he condemns the whole English aristocracy for the evil which he unmasks in a few unworthy members. No doubt when he goes to England after his marriage with his ward, supposing they are to be married in Sorrento and not in Kokomo, he will find English lords whom he will respect and like as much as he liked the Russian grand duke. No doubt the liking will be reciprocal. But we are speaking of the Man now and not of the play. But perhaps it will be the same with the play, if it ever goes to England. Never mind, though, we are not called upon to settle the question. If the play ever reaches London the whole subject of the Indiana school will be gone over in that refreshing way the English writers have; and even if the verdict is unfavorable,

MISS ALICE LLOYD

England's greatest singing comedienne who will appear this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum.

Kokomo will be not a whit downcast. Kokomo is egoistic, as the Grand Duke would say; it is so busy being itself that it has no time aping other people, a characteristic which it shares with London. By the way, I was awfully glad to see the Grand Duke for he is none other than my old friend Charles Herman. Many a time and oft in the theatres that are no more have I climbed to balcony, yea to gallery-top and there have sat the live-long night to see Charles Herman lend his capable support to dear old Fred Warde and Louis James. It is a pleasure to see him once more, a gratification to say that he is a better actor than ever. It is a good cast. Henry Hall is a consistent hoosier and won the plaudits of the discriminating. How these same discriminating ones did go into ecstacies over that paw-paw joke! Miss Forbes has a suggestion of Ethel Barrymore grace about her. When her feelings were aroused in the last act she showed a firm grip on her situation by letting herself go splendidly (no paradox intended and no bull, my Anglo-Saxon friend). If there were less melodrama in the play, some of the other players would have done better with their parts.

A Crackerjack Vaudeville Show

Is there anything quite so enjoyable in the line of theatrical entertainment as to lean back in your chair during a good Orpheum show and puff a fragrant cigar? It would be difficult to think of a pleasure more satisfying; but when the show is the Road Show, as the Christmas entertainment at the Orpheum is called, the satisfaction is raised to the superlative degree. The Road Show is carefully selected from the best acts of the circuit and more than any other vaudeville show of the year, it possesses variety, the most important attribute of this kind of amusement. The Orpheum Road Show this year is a crackerjack entertainment which nobody who loves vaudeville should miss. It includes a ventriloquist, song and dance artists, a comic pianist, a serious playlet, blackface comedians, a monkey act, eccentric comedians, a spectacular beauty with a trained horse and motion pictures. If that is not variety, where will you find it? The ventriloquist has "class." Carl Nobel is the first of his kind, in my experience, to use his puppets in a real music hall act. He does not sit them on his knees and exchange ancient jokes with them but makes them promenade and sing and "kid" the orchestra like real vaudeville performers. The effect is much better than that produced by the ordinary American ventriloquist. Harry Fox is a comedian with a real style; his mugging and posturing are extremely funny and he is equally happy in his singing and talking. The Millership Sisters who are with him are pretty and always clever, but as dancers they are tip-top. They are supple and graceful and execute their steps in a leisurely easy-breathing sort of manner which is the acme of good clogging. Hyman Meyer is a low German comedian who hits the high places of that particular form of variety entertainment. Others can mangle English as effectively but Meyer does it to a piano accompaniment which is not only droll but artistic; for his funny purposes he is a master of the instrument. "A Bit of Old Chelsea" is a sentimental classic which need only be enjoyed; it need not be believed. The enjoyment it gives depends on the way in which the part of "Saucers" is played. Miss Ida O'Day is so pretty and sweet that she makes the sketch very enjoyable, but a better actress could do a great deal more with it. Miss O'Day is not old or experienced enough to depict a London flower girl to the life. Even "Saucers," a flower girl who never existed and could never exist, in Holborn or elsewhere, is a little too much for Miss O'Day. You know very well that she is not a poor flower girl; you know that she did not faint in the fog from hunger and exhaustion; you know that she is not a Cockney. But Miss O'Day need not be discouraged. The actress who played the slavey in "The Prince Chap" at the Van Ness a year or so ago could play "Saucers," but she is much older than Miss O'Day. Miss O'Day is so young that her girlish charm carries her through "A Bit of Old Chelsea" to the general satisfaction of the audience. The two Fays and the two Coleys are blackface singers and dancers who sing and dance exceedingly well, but who become particularly funny when they give nonsensical imitations of an automobile and a trolley car. For those who delight in the display of simian intelligence "A Night in a Monkey Music Hall" will be a great attraction and even those who dislike such acts as a rule will be forced to confess that here is something which is amusing and not for a moment disgusting. Mae Melville and Robert Higgins are eccentrics, Higgins' eccentric dress affording Mae Melville a fruitful topic for convulsing banter of an unusually clean-cut kind. Mae Melville is a "kidder" of the delightful sophisticated order that appeals to a vaudeville audience.

FRANK LA FORGE
Pianist with Mme. Sembrich

Hers is one of the biggest individual hits of the bill. La Titcomb is the loudly heralded singer on horseback. She is a Titian beauty of Junoesque proportions who displays her charms in tights. Her horse is a splendid milk-white Arabian, trained to do fancy steps. La Titcomb sings indifferently and does a Loie Fuller stunt with waving draperies played upon by variegated lights which is pleasing to the eye.

David Warfield in "The Music Master"

Belasco's eminent star, David Warfield, will be the great attraction at the Van Ness Theatre for the two weeks commencing Monday, December 29. Warfield's engagement will be devoted entirely to the presentation of what is most assuredly his greatest triumph, "The Music Master" which was written for him by Charles Klein and is as sweet and human a stage story as has ever been seen. Warfield will be surrounded by his New York company which has just assisted him in rounding out a tour of the Southern States. There is a big advance sale of seats for his engagement at the Van Ness and he will undoubtedly be accorded a big reception when he steps on the stage next Monday night.

EDITH LYLE

Ezra Kendall Next

The last performances of George Cohan's musical comedy, "45 Minutes from Broadway," will take place at the Savoy this Saturday afternoon and evening, and on Sunday night Ezra Kendall will begin an engagement of one week only in "The Vinegar Buyer." As a monologist Kendall is supreme and as a star in the new version of the play he is funnier than ever. Herbert Hall Winslow is responsible for the play and it is needless to say that it is replete with Kendallisms. The usual matinees will be given on Thursday and Saturday. "The Alaskan," the great comic opera success, will follow Ezra Kendall at the Savoy.

The Kreisler Farewell Concert

So many were unable to gain admission to his last concert that Fritz Kreisler has been induced by Manager Greenbaum to give a farewell concert this Sunday afternoon, December 26, at the Novelty Theatre. Violinists like Fritz Kreisler are heard but seldom in a lifetime and no one who cares for the melody from the "king of instruments" should miss hearing this genius. An entirely new program will be offered, including one of the important Bach works, the Bruch "Concerto" in G minor, some "Slavonic Dances" by Dvorak and other rare compositions. As an added number the artist will play Dvorak's "Humoresque." The sale of seats on Sunday will open at the theatre at 9:30 a. m. and phone orders will receive careful consideration.

Ade's Best at the Alcazar

An elaborate production of George Ade's greatest comedy, "The College Widow," is announced as the Alcazar's offering for the week commencing next Monday evening. Since the management first decided to present this famous play, about a month ago, the scenic artists, mechanics and electricians have been devoting all their spare working hours to preparing the accessories, and the result will be a pictorial production of unusual completeness. In the cast will be the full strength of the Alcazar company and a small army of supernumeraries. All the college boys will be genuine college boys selected from the Berkeley and Stanford universities. The title part will be played by Evelyn Vaughan who starred in it throughout an entire season. John Ince who is cast for the football hero, is fitted by temperament and physique for the character. Will R. Walling will be seen as "Old Man" Bolton, Grace Travers as the athletic girl, Bessie Barriscale as Flora Wiggins, Charles Dow Clarke

Another Week of "The Man from Home"

The second and last week of "The Man from Home" will begin on Sunday evening. The last matinee will be given on New Year's Day. Large crowds have attended every performance of this play and have shown the liveliest interest and appreciation of its stirring scenes.

Alice Lloyd at the Orpheum

Miss Alice Lloyd, the English singing comedienne whose success in New York for the past three years has been remarkable, will appear at the Orpheum on Sunday. Miss Lloyd first sang in New York three years ago and scored a great hit. Klaw and Erlanger were anxious to star her this season in a special production but she prefered to continue in vaudeville until she had visited San Francisco. The McNaughtons who come to us for the first time next week are considered the funniest and most original of English comedians. They are great favorites in the London music halls and pantomimes. Those funny clowns, The Brothers Permane, will also appear in the coming bill. One of the hits of their performance is an imitation of two nightingales making love. Next week will be the last of the Orpheum Road Show supplemented by these attractions.

The Sembrich Concerts

Following a plan often used in the East, Manager Greenbaum announces that he will open a mail order sale for the Sembrich concerts to be given at the Garrick Theatre on Sunday afternoons, January 9 and 16, and Thursday night, January 13. Orders may be sent to him in care of Sherman, Clay & Co., corner Kearny and Sutter streets. They must be accompanied by check or money order and they will be held at the box office until the owner finds its convenient to call for them. If stamped and addressed envelopes are enclosed tickets will be returned by mail. With Madame Sembrich comes Francis Rogers, a baritone of fine reputation who will sing some of the great Mozart duets with the star, and Frank La Forge, pianist and accompanist, well remembered for his work with Mme. Gadski.

Barrie Fantasy at Ye Liberty

As their offering for New Year's week the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will present a spectacular production of "The Admirable Crichton," James M. Barrie's delightful fantasy, commencing next Monday evening. The play is one of the best known dramatic efforts of the brilliant Englishman, and has often been referred to as "Barrie in his happiest vein." The play contains many excellent parts and the cast, to be headed by Sydney Ayres as "Critchon," and Elizabeth Stewart, an old Frawley favorite, as Lady Mary, will be entirely adequate.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There has been a slow but steady enhancement of security values in the recent week as a result of buying by influential banking interests here. Little incentive occurred to create a public following in the upward trend, though dividends were increased on two of the leading railroads—L. & N. and Reading. The subject of labor difficulties over a wide area of the country was uppermost in the public mind. Hence the most important explanation of the rise is that it was the action of banking syndicates who are in possession of large lines of leading stocks upon which favorable developments are pending and which they will endeavor to market with easier money conditions after January 1. We feel conservatively bullish for the immediate market and believe stocks will be worked higher gradually.

Wheat—Small receipts and an extremely small visible supply of wheat have continued the strength in this market and advanced prices to the extreme level of the present crop. Not since the late fall and winter of 1898-99 have supplies of wheat been as small in this country as at present. The small receipts in the spring wheat region on account of the strike has been an added element and on the whole there can be no reasonable expectation of any important decline in values. Our exports are running as large as a year ago, notwithstanding the Pacific slope is not doing as well as expected. While the export of grain in the East is largely durum it has the effect of reducing the available amount. In view of the prices and movement to date, one must look deeper than a mere holding disposition by farmers for the acute condition. So far every evidence points to a yield smaller than reported by the government. Despite the addition of thirteen million bushels to the preliminary crop, the trading element takes note only of the amount of wheat available. Argentina's crop estimates are being lowered and the market there has had an advance of six cents this week. It seems now evident that this country will not have any more wheat than last year, which means that Europe will not have sufficient supplies without help from this country and Canada before the Australian and India crops are available. However, it is too early to say the last word on Argentina and the situation there may change somewhat, but at present it is decidedly bullish. Russia is practically out of the shipping except by rail and we are apt to have a better demand for Europe. The wheat is a purchase on all recessions, though there is a probability that December settlements may leave May open for a sale.

Corn—The market has been resting for several days after the violent bulge of Monday and it has been rather surprising that the reaction from the top did not extend farther. Profit taking was very heavy by the early bulls and since then there has been good buying by people who missed the market last week. There has not been much selling by professionals since the bulge which has held the market. In the meantime the receipts have been comparatively small compared to a year ago and cash demand has not been increased. This is due to the poor quality of the corn arriving and the hope of cash handlers to get good shipping grade later on. In such a situation the market is apt to show some weakness, especially if December deliveries are heavy the coming week. The ultimate market will be an advancing one and the best course to pursue is to buy on a scale down rather than sell, as public interest is apt to run away with the market at any time.

Cotton—The United States Census reported 9,362,000 bales ginned to December 13 against 11,904,269 last year and 9,284,070 bales in 1907. This means that there were only 484,000 bales ginned during the last period against 896,000 bales last year and 940,000 in the small crop year of 1907, and fully confirms the Agricultural Department's annual crom estimate of 10,088,000 bales. This is a final vindication of the bulls and a confirmation of the private advices that have been coming to us for months past and should unquestionably convince foreign manufacturers who use between 7,000,000 and 8,000,000 bales of American cotton annually that they are face to face with a panic, and make them realize that many spindles will have to be stopped for want of cotton before the new crop is available. There has been so much said recently to show the bullish cotton situation and to convince the manufacturing world of the facts that it is unnecessary to go into detail at this time, but I may say that with so small a crop in the face of such a large consumption, the cotton market should show material advance on its own merits and on the actual value of the commodity in the home markets before the new crop becomes a factor. When we say, before the new crop becomes a factor, we mean before it is possible to realize what season is in the ground; what amount of acreage is being prepared; amount of fertilizer to be used and the favorableness of the start of the crop of 1910. This will probably be in the latter part of January or possibly in February. In the meantime we believe in higher prices with natural reactions on liquidations.

Copper Stocks—The copper stock market for the past week has shown a stronger undertone and there have been several rallies in the Boston Coppers, especially in Lake. We have it from a reliable source that the values of Anaconda are all increasing and the ore bodies there promise to be the same as in Butte. Considering recent purchases both assured and rumored, great activity may be expected in the Ely properties. Nevada Consolidated is the biggest open cut mine in the United States except the Utah. The consolidation of the Guggenheim copper properties into one company is progressing rapidly and it is now believed that this will be the first important step in bringing about the merger of all the leading copper companies. In the consolidation of the Guggenheim companies, the Nevada Consolidated, the Utah Copper and Boston Consolidated and possibly some of the smelting and mining interests will be included. As the plan is now being worked out, it is believed that the Utah company will take over the other companies. The basis of exchange, though not definitely settled will, it is believed. be about two shares of Nevada Consolidated for one of Utah Copper. Negotiations are in progress whereby it is practically certain that the Utah will take over the Boston Consolidated for one share of Utah. Cherry Creek, is shipping to the Cherry Creek Mill the greatest tonnage that they have ever shipped and the camp shows every evidence of permanency. A big strike was made north of Butte Mountain in the north-central part of Nevada and it is stated on good authority that this Butte Mountain District will be another Ely as the ground and formations look the same. The British Columbia Copper Co. is treating 12,000 tons a day and will show up better in six months than today. We think that from three to six months after the merger is consummated, copper metal will go to 15 cents. The merger will limit the output of copper and eventually the price will get back to the good old days when it was 18 to 20 cents.

Local Securities—As the Christmas holidays approach, the local stock and bond market becomes quieter and wide fluctuations are scarcer. As has been the rule for several weeks past, the chief activity during the week has been in Spring Valley Water and Associated Oil. The former stock has been more or less pegged at 50 though there appear to be large buying order still remaining to be filled. Associated Oil seems to have recovered somewhat from its recent weakness, but it is becoming firm again at a slower pace. Alaska Packers has been quite irregular and has had to contend with rather heavy profit-taking sales. Hawaiian Sugar stocks, on the whole, have been lower. The fact that the Cuban sugar crop is starting to move has caused a reduction in the price of raw sugar. Pacific Telephone stocks continue dull without much change. Pacific Gas and Electric stocks, after passing through a period of extreme neglect, are commencing to reawaken and are once more drawing bids from eastern sources. Activity in bonds has been more or less reduced but the general list appears quite firm. The chief dealings continue in Associated Oil 5s, City Electric 5s, Pacific Telephone 5s, Peoples Water 5s, Southern Pacific refunding 4s, Spring Valley Water 4s and United Railroads 4s. It is the general belief that Associated Oil, Alaska Packers and Spring Valley Water are the most profitable purchases at their present quotations and that Pacific Gas and Electric, common and preferred, should be bought now before a rush of eastern orders bids the market up on them. It is learned on good authority that the United Railroads will show an increase in gross earnings of about 8½ per cent over last year.

WALDEN

In swift and sudden dreams each night I greet
The host of friends that in my heart I bear;
I chat in paradox with Baudelaire,
I talk with Gautier of the obsolete—
My absinthe and De Musset's brandy meet;
And by some special favor here and there,
Now with Elaine and now with Guinevere,
I pass the day in some serene retreat.
Heine's malicious eyes have gazed in mine,
And I have sat at Leopardi's feet.
And once I heard the lute-strung song divine
That Sappho and the Lesbian girls repeat,
But yet, what night have I not sought in vain
To meet and muse with Emerson again.

WILLIAM H. HIGH, Manager

The United Railroads

Without minimizing the value of the work of rehabilitation done by others, it may be said that the work of restoration accomplished by the United Railroads was the greatest single factor in the solidification of public confidence during the dark days that followed the disaster.

The United Railroads may truly be called a pioneer of that era. Its cable-houses were destroyed, its tracks warped and twisted by the heat, its wires down, many of its cars and most of its supplies burned, and its force of operatives scattered no one knew where. Tracks were restored, wires strung and operatives collected. On April 21 cars were run for the accommodation of passengers, and, so far as the equipment of the system was concerned, there was nothing to interrupt traffic from that time on. In ten days operations had been resumed on all the important lines. When San Francisco saw the blood circulate through its veins, it knew it would recover.

Meantime, while the local officials of the United Railroads were working day and night, without rest or food, to restore the wrecked system, Patrick Calhoun, president of the company, was nearly, if not quite, as busy in the East. Early Wednesday morning Thornwell Mullally briefly described the conditions in this city in a dispatch to the president, who telegraphed the same day $75,000 for the relief of the stricken city, which had been subscribed by himself, Landenburg, Thalmann & Co., the United Railway Investment Company, C. Sidney Shepard and Ford, Bacon and Davis.

At the same time he wired $100,000 for the immediate needs of the United Railroads, and to aid in the resumption of service. He telegraphed to various street railways and received from them permission to purchase cars that were being built for them. In this way sixty-two cars were obtained long before they could have been specially built, and one order for $350,000 worth of cars was placed before the fire was entirely extinguished. As an instance of his confidence in the future of the city, President Calhoun sent the following dispatch to Mullally on April 21, the same day that service was permanently resumed:

"Confidence among our friends unshaken. Am arranging to furnish any additional engineers or other men you may need. The whole of Messrs. Ford, Bacon & Davis' force is at your disposal. Pittsburg is ready to furnish additional engines and dynamos if needed, and the Westinghouse and General Electric Company have kindly offered to furnish any temporary facilities in priority to all other orders. Congratulate you, Davis and Chapman on the effective way in which you have handled the situation. We are rejoiced at your and their safety."

In addition to the other reliefs that had been furnished, Mullally had sent an agent to Sacramento who bought a cargo of provisions. About $14,000 was expended in supplies for the refugees, and the provisions, which were unloaded from a steamer at the Presidio wharf, were the first to reach this city from the outside world.

In eight days cars were running on the Fillmore and Sixteenth streets line, from Fifth and Market along to Fifth and Mission, and thence to Sixteenth, and in eleven days after the flames first broke forth nearly the entire unburned portion of the city had lines in operation. A few days later the lines on Ellis, O'Farrell, Turk and Eddy were opened to traffic. While the burned district was a sea of ruins and spectral walls, the only lights to be seen were those that shone through the windows of the electric cars.

A condition had been reached where it became necessary to substitute the overhead trolley for the cable or continue to give an inadequate service that would result in loss of fares to the company and retard the growth of the city. The results have proven the wisdom of the change, and one seldom today sees a space of several blocks between cars during rush hours.

The new roadbed of the United Railroads is the best in the world, and the substitution of electric for cable lines made this result possible. In tearing up the cable conduits, a sufficient quantity of crushed concrete was obtained to form a bed several feet in depth, and was reduced to a hard foundation with a ten-ton steam roller. On this bed, standard railroad ties of redwood were laid.

The steel laid runs 107, 109 and 141 pounds to the yard. The average street railway rail runs 65 pounds to the yard, and this is about the weight laid in other cities. The average rail for steam roads runs 90 pounds to the yard. The 141-pound rails have been laid on Market and other streets where the traffic is great and the wear proportionate. The rails are grooved and lay flush with the pavement, both inside and outside, so that they offer no obstruction to team traffic. All crossings, frogs and switches are cast with hardened points of manganese steel.

In laying the tracks the greatest care has been taken to secure permanency of construction. The best English cement, of a quality used in building, but seldom in railroad construction, has been employed. On the heavy construction, brace plates of steel secure the rails at a distance of every eight feet. Concrete stringers also run at the flange of the rails, where asphalt pavement is laid, and solid concrete between the rails with a cushion of sand, where basalt blocks are laid.

In this manner the city has secured more than fifty miles of the best possible pavement, which, including space between tracks and two feet each side of the tracks, forms a strip nearly twenty feet in width. For more than a year after the fire, as on Fourth street, the only pavement existing on the thoroughfare was that laid by the United Railroads. Indeed, the needs of team traffic became so great on some of the streets that the company abandoned the operation of cars and turned its tracks and pavements over to the use of heavy teaming.

Besides the miles of pavement the company has furnished for the use of the public, a great deal of preliminary grading, as on lower Market street, has been done. When the cars first started from the Ferry up Market their windows were level with the sidewalks in several places and a fill of four and a half feet was required. More than half of Market from the Ferry to Sansome, where the company has four tracks, was paved by the United Railroads, and it is now the best graded and best paved street in San Francisco.

All this work involved great labor. While the removal of the cable conduits increased the work, it enabled the company to get a better foundation. All the blocks of concrete had to be drilled and split by hand, as blasting was forbidden, and were later crushed by electrically driven machinery mounted on flat cars.

The overhead construction is characterized by the same degree of excellence that marks the roadbed and tracks. Temporary poles have been in use over much of the system, but these are soon to be replaced. The three-eighths-inch span wire is the heaviest in use and has a breaking strength of 5,000 pounds. Porcelain insulators were originated for the use of the United Railroads in 1901, and all overhead metal parts are galvanized to resist atmospheric deterioration.

Another improvement is the erection on Market, Valencia and Sutter streets of ornamental poles bearing arc lights. The poles are set every hundred feet on Market street from the Ferry to Valencia, on Valencia street from Market to Mission and Twenty-eighth, and on Sutter street from Sansome to Van Ness avenue.

The United Railroads pays for the lighting of these streets. The new poles add greatly to the appearance of the city, and are especially fine for illuminations.

There are many other minor improvements that cannot be entered into for lack of space. Many of these have been carried out, some are in course of being carried out, while others are in contemplation, as they do not involve questions of actual operation, but rather tend to the improvement and beautification of the city.

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

Written exclusively for Town Talk by J. M. JACOBI

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

Mid-Season Dress Accessories

The chief novelty in the way of dress accessories that has been offered this fall for the wearer's consideration is doubtless the velvet hat. The velvet hat, or "Velour" as it is generally called in the trade, did not meet with the instantaneous approval when the cold weather set in, that was predicted for it earlier in the season. In fact, few of them, comparative speaking, had been seen on the streets, and these were chiefly affected by young bloods, most of whom had doubtless just returned from abroad, and took it up in consideration of the popularity this headgear is now enjoying in Europe.

The shops, however, are pretty well stocked up with the Velour; and the imported articles in greens, browns, blues and grays from $10 up are distinctly "classy." The great drawback in this latest offering is the opportunity it presents for imitation in cheaper grades, and already rough velvet hats may be had as cheap as $2. Surely no good dresser would take to such an article even if he saw something commendable in it, when it is being imitated for and worn by hoi polloi.

In the matter of seasonable haberdashery—neckwear for day dress is very generally restricted to neat figured silk or satin cravats, and the quieter tones of colorings prevail. The deservedly popular Ascot scarfs are now shown in profusion and many rich effects are offered by the shops.

The collar situation remains practically the same, the fold or band collar being the correct style in conjunction with business dress. The poke collar is still regarded as the eminently proper type for evening clothes; still there are many good dressers who have taken kindly to the small wing style of collar for such formal wear. One thing in favor of the wing collar is that its conformation admits of a certain amount of ease and comfort for the wearer, particularly when he is attending some social function besides a dance.

Evening dress shirts both in stiff pique and soft pleated linen bosoms are gaining in favor, and another season will probably find the plain starched evening shirt relegated entirely to the position now occupied by the padded shirt shield. Some of the real advanced dressers have their pique front dress shirts made with turn back cuffs. They are the linked style, yet double, and of the same material as the bosom, being attached to the sleeve, of course.

The knitted silk muffler having superseded the padded satin shirt shield for protecting the shirt front of evening wear, such light yet serviceable form of dress requisite may be had in about any grade of quality to fit the individual's purse. The colors are restricted to black and gray, and white.

House coats and dressing robes are coming in for some share of attention just now, and are in fair demand. The shops are making some particularly attractive offerings. Satin robes of roomy proportions, secured by a waist cord, shown by some of the shops in figureded navy blues and browns, suggest the luxurious comfort possible to attain in such lounging apparel.

The Diamond Rubber Company at Akron and the local branch here have just finished some very interesting tests of the relative lasting qualities of natural air and carbonic gas in auto tires. Three tires were pumped up one day at 1:30 p. m. by air to 100 pounds pressure each. At the same time three similar sized tires were inflated with carbonic gas with the same pressure. One week later at 1:30 p. m. the three air filled tires registered 92 pounds each while the three gas filled tires stood 41, 50 and 51 pounds. Should an owner pump his tires to 100 pounds with carbonic gas and not have a noticeable puncture, he is likely to assume even a week later that he has been running with the proper inflation, whereas he really has only half enough and considerable damage may have been done to the body of the tire. Speaking of this point, Mr. Mathewson, Pacific Coast Manager of the Diamond Rubber Company, says: "There is only one sure way of getting proper inflation and proper service from tires and that is to keep them blown up so that they stand full and round under a maximum load when in motion. If this is done there will be a decided increase in tire service."

the memory of the good he has presented and crucified by consent be a thorn in the side to buffet him.

A gentleman of Jewish aspect the Universalist born to bring peace on earth, peace born of the good-will of man to men. Of Jewish aspect, which I would be the last to emphasize were it not that Christian painters be who forget the untorgettable fact, to say nothing of the myriads who make mental pictures of the Messiah. The son's son's son of Christian priests in high places, it devolves upon me to ask forgiveness of my Hebrew brethren for the many crimson sins of my savage forbears against their civilized, and above all for the unpardonable marble-hearted hendish sin of ingratitude, which works of art, if themselves live, must unwittingly immortalize. What is True Art to think of the proselyting painters that will convert the face of Christ's self to Christianity? Ignore the fact that the odds are twelve to one against Judas being the typical Jew? Small wonder the cynic: The only Christian that ever lived died upon the cross! Artists and popular belief to the contrary notwithstanding, the mother of Jesus, Jewish Gentleman, was neither madonna-like nor Marguerite-like nor racially like any woman in the world save the unique Semitic. If for the Hebrew to say to his brother, Raca, thou fool, is to be in danger of the hell of fire, at what peril does the Christian cry Christ-killer! to the blood-brother of the Annointed? True, Christ tells us who is his brother—none other than he who does what Christ tells him, and that is: Love one another, and, What ye would that men do to you, do even so to them. In this cosmopolitan day, if devil-driven we still needs must use the odious index-finger at all, let it suffice to point out the place a man occupies in the great human family! Why add "in Jury" to insult? Self-deception clouds the clearest vision, no matter how nicely we make our allowance therefor, the personal equation persists, nor lets any man wholly eliminate it, yet, my hand on my heart, my eyes turned inward and downward, I venture to say that, if I know myself, I am intolerant of nothing save intolerance. Pontius Pilate the Roman, had not he, too, a hand in the death of the Just and Gentle? Is it because next to Ireland Italy is the most Christian of countries that his vilest detractor never dreams of dubbing the Roman of today Christ-killer? Is it due to Art that no blessed bambino need ever run home from free American school, to bury his curly head in his madonna's lap and sob out his crucified little heart in any such wise as this: Did my dear papa really kill Christ? No worse befalls Young Italy than to have to blink at Young America's left-handed half-endearing "Dago," nor is the serenity of Young Greece disturbed by any kithogue "Socrates-killer." Because the three syllables make the epithet unwieldy, no doubt.

One way or another Gentleness is inevitably crucified. What in fact killed Christ? Roman civil law plus Hebraic religious law plus Lynch law or public opinion. Who are the Christ-killers nowadays? They that crucify him afresh. How is he crucified afresh? By hate—Hate's word said, or deed done, unto one of these his brethren.

Is the fate of the favorite son inescapable by the Hebrew? by Israel, God's eldest and undoubted heir, much envied of the younger sons and, it may be, a little spoiled of his Father; the law of his primogenitureship unabrogable, being that of Heredity's self? Is it that we have taken the gentle, if imperfectly sympathetic, Elia seriously, to the extent of imitating him beforehand? Is it because we Christians belong to the "great race" of borrowers, they, the Hebrews, to the small race of lenders, that we arrogate to ourselves the right to lord it over them—right of the rosy gilled, of the beautiful reliers on Providence?

A word here to the world's present three wise men—whoever they may be, if they be, myself know but one—as to the significance of a great shepherd king being father to a greater son. To whom other than such as watch their flocks by night did the glory of the Lord appear? Who, speaking the simple first-come words of his country, said Feed my sheep? Who is himself known as the Good Shepherd- and why? All this, lest at Christmas we Christians forget that the Shakesperean greatness or Lamb-like littleness of money-lending was thrust upon the most pastoral of peoples! Roman law, Hebraic law, Public Opinion law—of all three have we, the great race, greatly borrowed. Even more than filthy lucre have we borrowed of the Jew clean religion. But, times changing, was it Hebraic law adopted, or Christian law pure and original, that forbade the brainy sons of mothers in Israel,—children of light in bondage to Philistinism personified,—from entering the learned professions?

But what are you trying to bring home to us? What have we here in brightest California to do with what goes on only in darkest Russia? Are we keepers of our brothers of the Greek Church in Kischineff, or in the remotest way responsible for their deplorable outrages?

Here in the city of the gentle Saint Francis, who speaks of "my brother, the wolf," dwell a beautiful Spanish woman of Semitic aspect and her Norwegian husband who, strangely enough, passes even among Hebrews for a Hebrew. More than once have they as it were been politely requested to find shelter in the stable, although there was ample room for them in the inn; that is to say, now one, now another, hostelry patronized of the rich Christian fanatic has denied them its hospitality, all because, as they afterwards learned, of that deceitful thing, their appearance. In the sight of the honest hostler they were as of old Samaritans in that of those honest hypocrites, scribes and Pharisees—persons with whom he might have no dealings. Yet could one Samaritan be neighbor to the Jew that fell among thieves, and one Jew that hung between thieves be neighbor to the "poor indeed" Samaritan woman! On the other hand, is a Jewess who, ever taken by Christians for a Christian, hears out of the mouths of neither babes nor sucklings enough gratuitous slurs upon her Christ-bearing race to make a New Testament. What Pharisee with ears to hear dare ask: Can such things be? It is for very shame that I emphasize the Jewish aspect of the World-man whose birth we may duly celebrate only with love in our hearts and sorrow that we have done to men what we would not have them do to us, that we have not done to men what we would have them do to us. For such toleration as passes easily and imperceptibly into appreciation, into perfect sympathy, let us at least seasonably pray the Hebrew Babe, best known by the name of Universal Love!

fully placed on the lips of that face. The down did not even tremble. Then she bared the breast of the body on the bed, and laid her ear upon the region of the heart; I could see her eyes blinking as she listened intensely. After she had listened some time she raised her head, with a little sob, and frantically pulled the bell-rope. I could hear the bell; we could both hear it. There was no response; nothing but a fearful silence. Margaret, catching her breath, rushed out of the room. I was sick with the most awful disgust that I could not force her to see where I was. I had been helpless before, when I lay in the bed, but I was far more completely helpless now. Talk about the babe unborn!

She came back with the servant, and the two women stood on either side of the bed, gazing at that body. The servant whispered:

"They do say that if you put a full glass of water on the chest you can tell for sure."

Margaret hesitated. However, the servant began to fill a glass of water on the washstand, and they poised it on the chest of that body. Not the slightest vibration troubled its surface. I was—not angry; no, tremendously disgusted is the only term I can use—at all the flummery with that body on the bed. It was shocking to me that they should confuse that body with me. I thought them silly, wilfully silly. I thought their behaviour monstrously blind. There was I, the master of the house, standing chilled between the windows, and neither Margaret nor the servant would take the least notice of me!

The servant said:

"I'd better run for the doctor, ma'am." And she lifted off the glass.

"What use can the doctor be?" Margaret asked. "Only spoil the poor man's night for nothing. And he's had a lot of bad nights lately. He told me to be—prepared."

The servant said:

"Yes, mum. But I'd better run for him. That's what doctors is for."

As soon as the front-door banged on the excited servant, my wife fell on that body with a loud cry, and stroked it passionately, and I could see her tears dropping on it. She wept without any restraint. She loved me very much; I knew that. But the fact that she loved me only increased my horror that she should be caressing that body, which was not me at all, which had nothing whatever to do with me, which was loathsome, vile, and as insensible as a log to the expressions of her love. She was not weeping over me. She was weeping over an abomination. She was all wrong, all tragically wrong, and I could not set her right.

III.

I do not suppose that the feeling which came over me is capable of being described in human language. It can only be hinted at, not truly conveyed. If I say that I was utterly overcome by the sensation of being "cut off from everything," I shall perhaps not impress you very much with a notion of my terror. But I do not see how I can better express myself. No one who has not been through what I have been through—it is a pretty awful thought that all who die do probably go through it—can possibly understand the feeling of acute and frightful loneliness that possessed me as I stood near the windows, that wrapped me up and enveloped me, as it were, in an icy sheet. A few people in England are possibly in my case—they have "been," and they have returned, like me. They will understand, and only they. I was solitary in the universe. I was invisible, and I was forgotten. There was my poor wife lavishing her immense sorrow on that body on the bed, which had ceased to have any connection with me, which was emphatically not me, and to which I felt the strongest repugnance. I was even jealous of that lifeless, unresponsive, decaying mass. You cannot guess how I tried to yell to my wife to come to me and warm me with her companionship and her sympathy—and I could accomplish nothing, not the faintest whisper.

I had no home, no shelter, no place in the world, no share in life. I was cast out. The changeless purposes of nature had ejected me from humanity. It was as though humanity had been a fortified city and the gates had been shut on me, and I was wandering round and round the unscalable smooth walls, and beating against their stone with my hands. That is a good simile, except that I could not move. Of course if I could have moved I should have gone to my wife. But I could not move. To be quite exact, I could move very slightly, perhaps about an inch or two inches, and in any direction, up or down, to left or right, backwards or forwards; this by a great, straining, fatiguing effort. I was stuck there on the surface of the world, desolate and undone. It was the most cruel situation that you can imagine, far worse, I think, than any conceivable physical torture. I am perfectly sure that I would have exchanged my state, then, for the state of no matter what human being, the most agonized martyr, the foulest criminal. I would have given anything, made any sacrifice, to be once more within the human pale, to feel once more that human life was not going on without me.

There was a knocking below. My wife left that body on the bed, and came to the window and put her head out into the nocturnal, gaslit silence of Trafalgar Road. She was within a foot of me—and I could do nothing.

She whispered: "Is that you, Mary?"

The voice of the servant came: "Yes, mum. The doctor's been called away to a case. He's not likely to be back before five o'clock."

My wife said with sad indifference: "It doesn't matter now. I'll let you in."

She went from the room. I heard the opening and shutting of the door. Then both women returned into the room, and talked in low voices.

My wife said: "As soon as it's light you must. . . . "She stopped and corrected herself. "No, the nurse will be back at seven o'clock. She said she would. She will attend to all that. Mary, go and get a little rest, if you can."

"Aren't you going to put the pennies on his eyes, mum?" the servant asked.

"Ought I?" said my wife. "I don't know much about these things."

"Oh yes, mum. And tie his jaw up," the servant said.

His eyes! His jaw! I was terribly angry, in my desolation. But it was a futile anger, though it raged through me like a storm. Could they not understand, would they never understand, that they were grotesquely deceived? How much longer would they continue to fuss over that body on the bed while I, I, the person whom they were supposed to be sorry for, suffered and trembled in dire need just behind them?

A ridiculous bother over pennies! There was only one penny in the house, they decided, after searching. I knew the exact whereabouts of two shillings worth of copper, rolled in paper in my desk in the dining room. It had been there for many weeks; I had brought it home one day from the works. But they did not know. I wanted to tell them, so as to end the awful exacerbation of my nerves. But of course I could not. In spite of Mary's superstitious protest, my wife put a penny on one eye and half-a-crown on the other. Mary seemed to regard this as a desecration, or at best as unlucky. Then they bound up the jaw of that body with one of my handkerchiefs. I thought I had never seen anything more wantonly absurd. Their trouble in straightening the arms—the legs were quite straight—infuriated me. I wanted to weep in my tragic vexation. It seemed as though tears would ease me. But I could not weep.

The servant said: "You'd better come away now, mum, and rest on the sofa in the drawing-room."

Margaret, with red-bordered, glittering eyes, answered, staring all the while at that body: "No, Mary. It's no use. I can't leave him. I won't leave him!"

But she wasn't thinking about me at all. There I was, neglected and shivering, near the windows; and she would not look at me!

After an interminable palaver, Margaret induced the servant to leave the room. And she sat down on the chair nearest the bed, and began to cry again, not troubling to wipe her eyes. She sobbed, more and more loudly, and kept touching that body. She seized my gold watch, which hung over the bed, and which she wound up every night, and kissed it and put it back. Her sobs continued to increase. Then the door opened quickly, and the servant, half-undressed, crept in, and without saying a word gently led Margaret out of the room. Margaret's last glance was at that body. In a moment the servant returned and extinguished the gas, and departed again, very carefully closing the door. I was now utterly abandoned.

IV.

All that had happened to me up to now was strange; but what followed was still more strange and still less capable of being described in human language.

I became aware that I was gradually losing the sensation of being cut off from intercourse, at any rate that the sensation was losing its painfulness. I didn't seem to care, now, whether I was neglected or not. And to be cast out from humanity grew into a matter of indifference to me. I became aware, too, of the approach of a mysterious freedom. I was not free; I could still move only an inch or so in any direction; but I felt that a process of dissolving of bonds had begun. What manner of bonds? I don't know. I felt—that was all. My indifference slowly passed into a sad and deep pity for the world. The world seemed to me so pathetic, so awry, so obstinate in its honest illusions, so silly in its dishonest pretences. "Have I been content with that?" I thought, staggered. And I was sorry for what I had been. I perceived that the ideals of my life were tawdry, that even the best were poor little things. And I perceived that it was the same with everyone, and that even the greatest men, those men that I had so profoundly admired as of another clay than mine, were as like the worst as one sheep was like another sheep. Weep—because nature had ejected me from that petty little world, with its ridiculous and conceited wrongness? What an idea! Why, I said to myself, that world spends nearly the whole of its time in moving physical things from one place to another. Change the position of matter—that is all it does, all it thinks of. I remembered a statesman who had referred to the London and North Western Railway as being one of the glories of England! Parcels! Parcels! Parcels, human, brute, insensate! Nothing but parcel-moving! I smiled. And then I perceived that I could understand and solve problems which had defied thousands of years of human philosophy, problems which we on earth called fundamental. And lo! They were not in the least fundamental, but were trifles, as simple as Euclid. It was surprising that the solution of them had not presented itself to me before! I thought: With one word, one single word, I could enlighten the human race beyond all that it has ever learned. Feeble-bodied, feeble-minded humanity!

And then I had a glimpse. . . . I was in the bedroom, near the windows, all the time, but nevertheless I was nowhere, nowhere in space. I could feel the roll of the earth as it turned lumberingly on its axis—a faint shaking which did not affect me. Still, I was in the bedroom, near the windows. And I had a glimpse. . . . The heralds of a new vitality swept trumpeting through me, and a calm, intense, ineffable joy followed in their train. I had a glimpse. . . . And my eyes were not dazzled. I yearned and strained towards what I saw, towards the exceeding brightness of undreamt companionships, hopes, perceptions, activities, and sorrows. Yes, sorrows! But what noble sorrows they were that I felt awaited me there! I strained at my mysterious bonds. It seemed that they were about to break and that I should be winged away into other dimensions. . . .

And then, I knew that they were tightening again, and the brightness very slowly faded, and I lost faith in the gift of vision which momentarily had enabled me to see the illusions and the littleness of the world. And I was slowly, slowly drawn away from the window. . . . And then I felt heavy weights on my eyes, and I could not move my jaw. I shuddered convulsively, and a coin struck the floor and ran till it fell flat. And the door swiftly opened. . . .

V.

Yes, my whole character is changed, within; though externally it may seem the same. Externally I may seem to have resumed the affections and the interests which occupied me before my illness and my remarkable recovery. Yet I am different. Certainly I have lost again the strange transcendental knowledge which was mine for a few instants. Certainly I have descended again to the earthly level. All those magic things have slipped away, except hope. In a sure hope, in a positive faith, I am waiting. I am waiting for all that magic to happen to me again. I know that the pain of loneliness, when again I shall see my own body from the outside, will be exquisite, but—the reward! The reward! That is what is always at the back of my mind, the source of the calm joy in which I wait. Externally I am the successful earthenware manufacturer, happily married, getting rich on a china-firing oven, employing a couple of hundred workmen, etcetera, who was once given up for dead. But I am more than that. I have seen God.

sequence. However, nothing has happened yet to disturb its tranquility, and there is probably no reason to fear any inconvenient revelations.

Some mild degree of interest was added to the Cleveland-Brandenburg controversy by the discovery that Broughton Brandenburg was secluded in this city, but the legal, not the literary aspect of the case was the only portion which engaged attention. The Portola festival was the occasion for the issuance of innumerable guide books but none of them proved of more than transient value to visitors, except, perhaps "The March of Portola," which will afford a starting point for future historians, novelists and scribblers generally. Mr. Rufus Steele's "City That Is" is of far more value and importance. Geraldine Bonner seems to have abandoned novel writing. She produced one successful play, "Shams." James Tully may claim a joint share of credit, for his successful drama, "Cupid, the Cow-punch," is founded on the novel, or rather, the series of connected short stories written by his wife, Elinor Gates Tully, who, if she never wrote anything else, would be gratefully remembered for her "Biography of a Prairie Girl."

Added to the roll of the dead during the year were G. B. Dinsmore, one of the early day writers and for a long time editor of the never forgotten "Golden Era"; Adeline Knapp, one of the first and the best of the nature school, and Charles Warren Stoddard, "the Pierre Loti of America." Mr. Stoddard, despite his long residence elsewhere appeared to be peculiarly a Californian, and though, on his return some time ago, he announced it as his intention of spending his last years amongst us, it was hoped that the end would be long deferred. Unlike so many of our western writers, he was not addicted to personalities and criticism, and it is impossible to recall, in all his voluminous writings, a single sentence that could give pain to a brother of his craft. He lies buried in the shadow of the Carmel Mission. Before his death he destroyed all manuscripts, letters and other "literary remains," and however much his admirers would welcome some "last word," at least there will be no ghoulish exploitation of what he himself reserved.

Our two local publishers, A. M. Robertson and Paul Elder, have brought out their usual number of volumes reflecting credit on both taste and workmanship. The "down-town movement" was finally accomplished during the year, and the tendency of the principal book stores to locate in or near Union Square has made that the book if not the literary center of the city. Several of the large stores hitherto devoted to dry and fancy goods have added book departments also. San Francisco has always showed a commendable spirit of independence in literary and dramatic matters, and it is notable that the authorized list of best-sellers here is never the same and rarely approximately identical with that of other localities. Those godly folk who are fond of reminding us of our incorrigibility may find food for reflection in the fact that during one period, for no apparent reason save inclination, the Holy Bible was numbered in our list.

Auto Notes

The Diamond Rubber Co. of San Francisco are just in receipt of a very strong letter of recommendation covering their new demountable rims from the Lee Motor Car Co., distributors of the Cadillac for Southern California. They write that this type of rim equipped their Cadillac car in the Ascot race and that it proved in their opinion the best demountable rim on the market for either racing or touring purposes.

The new Buick model officially designated as Model "19" and popularly known as the "Buick-30," is the center of interest nowadays at the salesrooms of the Howard Automobile Company. This is the little car, the arrival of which has been anxiously awaited by many people both in and out of town, and many are coming in daily from the surrounding territory for the express purpose of seeing this new Buick creation, about which so much has been said and of which so much is expected. The new model is the same design mechanically as the Buick "White Streak" and the "Forty" and fills in the gap between these two already popular machines. The cylinders are 4¼x4½, cast in pairs and developing thirty horsepower. It has three speed selective type transmission and a wheel base of 105 inches.

An important change in the local motor trade has just been announced by W. L. Hughson of the firm of Hughson & Merton, to the effect that his concern has taken the Coast Agency for the Jones Speedometor and will carry a complete line of this well known speed marker in all the branches of this concern on the coast. The Jones Speedometor Manufacturing Company belongs to the United Manufacturers and in taking over this line, Hughson & Merton have added one more important feature to their already long list of automobile accessories.

The following message from the Chalmers-Detroit dealers in San Antonio, Texas, has been received by the Pioneer Automobile Company: "Ben Johnson in Chalmers-Detroit 'Thirty' wins six hour race three-quarter mile track defeating Barney Oldsfield in six-cylinder Knox, Burman in Buick, Clark in Jackson, Dehymel in sixty horsepower Stoddard-Dayton racer. Chalmers the only car to finish."

Another shipment of the 1910 Ford cars was received the other day by the Standard Motor Car Company. Included in the allotment is one of the town cars, which is being made a feature by the Ford Factory this season. This is the second shipment of town cars that the Standard Motor Car Company have received and according to reports of W. L. Hughson, the demand for this class of car will result in a great many of them being brought out within the next year.

Another new 1910 model Oldsmobile has just reached the salesrooms of the Howard Automobile Company. This time it is the "Olds Special" with a close coupled body, a car of beautiful lines that is receiving the admiration of all the auto men. This new model Olds is a 40 horsepower with four speed selective transmission, 118 inch wheel base and 36 inch wheels. All the fine points and detail are taken care of in distinctively Olds fashion, which means unsurpassed elegance and refinement.

"The great strides made recently in the construction of automobile engines are most clearly seen in the flexibility of action," says M. S. Harris of the Pioneer Automobile Company. "By flexibility is meant evenness of power delivery under different speed revolutions per minute. A motor of older design would not do even work at low speed revolutions, the pulsations being uneven. This contrast is most evident in the new Thomas six-cylinder forty horsepower shaft-driven car. This car will run at a regular even speed of two miles per hour in the high gear, and so slow will it run on the high that one can walk leisurely by its side. Yet it will run sixty miles per hour, or climb a very steep hill, on the same gear. These results are ideal and are what the manufacturers have been striving for for years."

W. L. Hughson, President of the Standard Motor Car Company, will leave immediately after Christmas for New York to attend the automobile show and the annual meeting of the United Manufacturers Association, of which he is the western representative.

The Pioneer Automobile Company report the sale of a new Model "M" six-cylinder forty horsepower Thomas to Mrs. E. F. Allen, wife of Wiley B. Allen of the piano company. This car was purchased after a thorough investigation of all the new 1910 models.

Frederick B. Moscovic, the well known eastern designer of automobiles, is spending a few weeks on the coast and passed through this city recently. In speaking of the new 1910 models, Mr. Moscovic states that he thinks there is more value in the Chalmers-Detroit thirty horsepower car than in any other that has ever been turned out in this country. "I have just spent a few days at the factory," said he, "and after studying their organization, and the way they do things, I can well understand why they are so far in the lead over other American manufacturers of cars."

W. L. Hughson, President of the Standard Motor Car Company, has just received notice of what is probably the most novel method ever used for the distribution of advertising matter. It is that practiced by the Ohio Automobile Company who handle Ford Motor Cars in Dayton, Ohio, and contiguous territory. The president of this company, Mr. Weston, is a balloon enthusiast and owns a large dirigible in which he makes frequent trips over the surrounding country. Several such trips had been made when the thought came to Mr. Weston that these trips could be made to serve a double purpose. Accordingly he had a million cards printed advertising Ford cars, and as the balloon passes over a town a bundle of these cards is tossed overboard. It is claimed that a fall of several thousand feet guaranteed a wide distribution of cards and that the mere fact of a card floating down from apparently nowhere, insures its being picked up and read.

Word has been received by W. L. Hughson, President of the Standard Motor Car Company, to the effect that the 20 horsepower Ford Touring Car, driven by J. J. Berthoff, has captured the small car event in the Hill Climbing Contest, held at Fort Lee, New York, last week.

F. D. Wood of Cement who recently purchased a Chalmers-Detroit thirty horsepower car and received delivery in Philadelphia, has written the Pioneer Automobile Company that he is about to return to the coast and has made arrangements for hic ar to be shipped to this city.

Severe Tests Prove Its Superiority

Although a comparatively new product, Zerolene has been more severely tested under all conditions than many other lubricants, and, distinctly better than any of these, has triumphed in every test.

ZEROLENE

Auto Lubricating Oil

lubricated the winning Thomas car in the famous New York to Paris race, also the Protos and Zust cars which ran second and third. Zerolene proved its perfect lubricating and non-carbonizing qualities, and its zero-working ability in the most severe tests to which a lubricating oil has ever been put.

Zerolene is the only "all round" oil that serves all types of cylinders and bearings. There is only one kind of Zerolene, produced in only one place in the world. Put up in sealed cans with patent spout that cannot be refilled. Also in barrels for garage trade.

REASONS WHY THE NEW RAMBLER IS A VERY SUPERIOR CAR.

All motors run some times. Others run most of the time. The NEW RAMBLER motors have run two years without faltering, and are to-day apparently as good as ever. All transmission work when new, and some of them last quite a while, but the NEW RAMBLER transmission have stood the test for two years and are as good as ever. Some cars have three universal joints; others have two. The NEW RAMBLERS have but one, and that one is made so that they show no sign of wear after two years' use. The differential and main drive gears on an automobile are usually an uncertain quantity, but here again the NEW RAMBLER in two years' use has never failed in a single instance. Any owner of 1908 or 1909 RAMBLER will verify these statements. To provide against accidents, we carry in stock duplicate parts, and we sell them at one-third the price usually charged.

Say, is Sing Sing far from here?

Well, it took me an hour to go there and a year to get back.

Yuletide Reflections

As she hung up her stocking she sadly cried:
"Ah! Santa Claus, if you knew
What would pleasure me most to find inside!
But how can I hope that you
Can divine what I painfully strive to hide
From the prying eyes of all?
A looker-on at the gay seaside;
A nun at a costume ball.
And you cannot give it if you would—"
She snapped the clasp in vexation,
And before her mirror sadly stood
Regarding her frail foundation.

Acidulous

Let me pass Yuletide by myself, for I
Abhor the annual animalish feed.
Each year with terror far abroad I fly,
To shun the sight of Christmas-dinner greed.
The turkey is a fowl that I detest,
It always reaches one reverse of hot—
While silly women ever get the breast,
And drumsticks fall unto my luckless lot.

This family uniting is a bore,
And so at festive seasons I vamoose
To where my inside is not rendered sore
By frigid turkey or congealing goose;
Where inside bits of celery are mine,
And where my portion is not bone and skin;
There can I sit me down alone to dine,
Unforced to wear a hypocritic grin.

A Strenuous Task

Wife—Are you going to trim the Christmas tree?

Husband—Not much. It's beyond my strength. I'm going to hire a milliner to do it.

A Good Average

Are you satisfied with the presents your friends sent you?

Perfectly, my dear. Of the thirty-four different articles I received three that are just what I wanted.

A Christmas Nuisance

Felice and I, we never meet
From one year's end unto another;
I seldom think of her, and she
Has precious little use for me,
Yet every Christmas we repeat
That awful gift-exchanging bother;
We're fettered to it, wrist and wrist,
Each has the other on her "list,"
And though we're both heart-sick of it,
We neither one would dare to quit.

The Mermaid

On Christmas Eve a merman tall
Went blithely forth to make a call
Upon a mermaid fair;
He found her, as you've doubtless guessed,
Upon a rock, in seaweed dressed,
A-combing of her hair.

Now, as the merman looked around,
No spray of mistletoe he found,
And he remarked the lack.
"You know I have no feet, and so,
How can I have a mistletoe?"
The mermaid answered back.

An Insuperable Objection

"I would like to give myself to you as a Christmas present," said young Poore to Miss Rocks.

"Papa does not allow me to receive expensive presents from young men," replied the maiden.

His Mournful Musing

"I believe I could be happy tonight," despondently cogitated the good-looking and popular bachelor, addressing himself, as he sat in his cosy den on Christmas Eve, "if I did not know that somewhere a neck-tie was bought today for my Christmas present."

Reprehensible

I do not like the acts some folks
Perform with far too little rarity,
Nor can I cherish Christmas jokes,
That savor not of Christian charity.
But chiefly those remiss I find,
And deem their actions reprehensible,
Who at this season deem it kind
To dole out gifts that they call "sensible."

You have nothing to hang up.

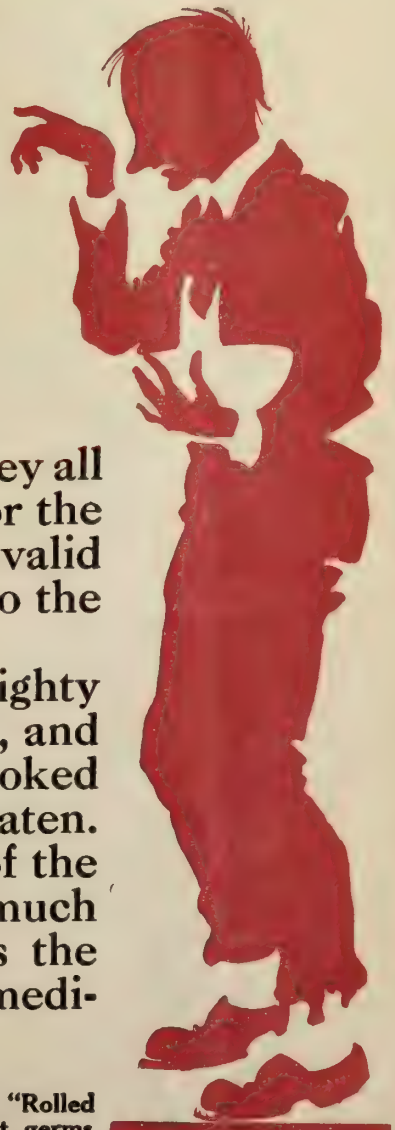
SAN FRANCISCO TOWN TALK

"I WANT SOME MORE!"



H-O oatmeal has created many Oliver Twists; they all "want more." It supplies a wholesome food for the growing boy and girl; it imparts strength to the invalid and the convalescent; and it gives nourishment to the old and feeble.

H-O is not ordinary Rolled Oats. There is a mighty difference between H-O steam-cooked oatmeal, and common raw Rolled Oats—which have to be cooked for at least sixteen hours before they are fit to be eaten. By our steam-cooking process, the edible part of the oat is directly acted on by dry steam, heated to a much higher degree than boiling water; this renders the starch soluble and provides a food ready for immediate digestion. An ideal food for everyone.

Do not confuse H-O oatmeal with the ordinary raw oats sold under the name of "Rolled Oats" or "Crushed Oats." H-O oatmeal is never sold in bulk; it is free from dirt, germs and all impurities.

H-O oatmeal is manufactured from the highest grade of selected stock. After removing all foreign matter, the meat of the oat is subjected to a very high temperature, and by our own patented process is cooked for several hours under heavy steam pressure. This steam-cooking dextrinizes the starch and renders the oats easily digestible.

H-O oatmeal is ready for the breakfast table after from ten to fifteen minutes' boiling and provides an inviting dish of sweet, clean, separate, tender kernels in place of the sticky, soggy, indigestible mass obtained in cooking the usual "Rolled Oats."

Possibly the "other" kind may be cheaper; but as soon as you have tested and appreciated the quality of H-O oatmeal, you will gladly pay the few cents difference.

The Big Conspiracy

Exposure has not abashed the combination of newspapers, magazines and demagogues formed for the purpose of conspiring against the Taft Administration to the end that the great Tribune who has been extinguishing life in the jungles of Africa be restored to power. This is a conspiracy that is not ashamed to show its brow either by day or night. It has resolved to disparage the President in whatever he does; to make it appear that he is in league with the powers of evil; that he is the puppet of the plunderbund and the enemy of the people, and apparently no scruples are to stand in the way of effective misrepresentation. The utterly shameless character of the campaign that is being conducted is evident from the groundless animadversions of the conspirators on the record of Judge Lurton, who was appointed to succeed Justice Peckham in the Supreme Court. Judge Lurton is described as a man with "a railroad mind." By way of justification of this description we are told that he upholds the principle of contributory negligence in railroad damage suits, and that in the suit arising out of the contest between Fiske and Harriman which involved control of the Southern Pacific Company he repudiated a principle that was afterwards upheld by the Supreme Court in the Northern Securities Merger case. This is a specimen of unscrupulous criticism that the average purveyor of political slander would not have the hardiwood to advance. The principle of contributory negligence which Judge Lurton is said to uphold is elementary. The judge that would disavow it would be justly regarded either as an ass or a knave or as uniting the qualities of both in what is known in California as a judgedunne. The other principle to which reference has been made was never passed upon by Judge Lurton, and it is inconceivable that the conspirators are under any misapprehension as to the points involved in the contest between Harriman and Fiske.

A New England Tragedy

Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard University, called upon to explain why Massachusetts rejected the divine boon to mankind, commonly known as the direct primary, responded thus: "Nobody liked the direct primary. It is expensive, it affords no means of resisting the bosses, it affords no means of preventing activity of the machine; indeed it strengthened the hold of the machine on the party." A deplorable explanation emanating from a source universally revered. Doubtless it has shocked the thousands of Harvard graduates who are numbered among the most ardent of our rainbow-chasers, and who stimulate hope and diffuse consolation among the less learned but equally enthusiastic prophets of the Millennium. Has Dr. Eliot fallen from grace? If not how can we account for his heterodox message breathing discouragement to civic patriots? He is reputed to be wise as a serpent and harmless as a dove, and yet here he is calling good evil, rejecting a divine revelation, raising his voice against the balm that has come to Gilead. How tragic that the disciples of the star-eyed goddess should thus be wounded in the house of their friend! It is the consensus of opinion among the only enlightened men in the country—the sincere champions of the people's cause—that to disavow the obvious efficacy of the direct primary is to argue oneself a servile tool of a corrupt boss. So Eliot has put himself beyond the pale; ostracism for him, and no recall or referendum. Here in California we shall soon produce convincing proof of the celestial origin of the one thing that approximates perfection in politics; for lo, the winter is passing, the flowers will soon appear, the time of the singing of birds is approaching, and ere long we shall be regaled with the voice of the turtle and the jocund jobchaser's sirenian song. With this year ends the reign of the boss. The machine is doomed to demolition. The two-legged animal without feathers is about to enter Utopia.

Our Dread of Danger

The faculty of Cornell University adopted a resolution the other day calling for a change in the rules of football with a view to making the game safe. Perhaps some day it may occur to somebody connected with our universities that we may be concerning ourselves too much about the dangers of football. The tests of physical courage are not so numerous nowadays that we can afford to reduce their number; nor is it advisable to refine all the brutality out of our nature. The inevitable tendency of civilization to effeminacy and effeteness is what we should dread more than the consequences of violent and hazardous athletic contests. Notwithstanding the Laird of Skibo and his zeal for universal peace war's dread alarums are still to be reckoned with, and the manufacture of heroes for the strife inevitable must not be discontinued. In this era physical courage is no less important than moral courage, and the best way to develop it is to glorify it as did the Greeks of old in the days when athletic heroes were celebrated in song and immortalized in sculpture. The Olympic games illustrated the regard paid by the unanimous consent of all the States of Greece to those exercises of physical force and intrepidity which preserved them so long from the corruptions of luxury and effeminacy into which through their growing opulence and familiarity with Oriental habits they would very soon otherwise have fallen. It was generally understood that these games maintained in the nation a general respect for a manly and intrepid character and supported that moral dignity and independence which, while they resisted for years the aggressions of force from without, were proof against the contagion of licentious principles within. Men were maimed and deformed in those games, as they are today in football, but the Greeks felt that the only deformity to be avoided was deformity of heart. The Greeks were great admirers of physical beauty, but they admired still more a stout heart, and they knew that under the powerful reaction of mind against the scorn of fools evoked by physical defects, men of worth rose to distinction and rendered valuable service to mankind. One of the first symptoms of effeteness in a people is an inordinate passion for luxury accompanied by sensitiveness to discomfort and pain. This symptom we already manifest. It is expressed in headache powders, painless dentistry and an abnormal craving for new creature comforts. Now pleasure and pain have a twin place in every moral system, being stimulants from opposite sides to a high principle, and we should not devote our time as we are to maximizing the one and minimizing the other. Football, it is true, is associated with the idea of pain and broken limbs, but only in a little greater degree than other forms of athletic sport that have been encouraged for centuries, mainly because of the physical hazards which they involved. Riding to hounds is a dangerous sport, and so is polo, but nobody ever heard of its being suggested in England, where they have long been popular, that they should be made "safe." We are told that every year many fatalities occur on the football field. If we must avoid everything that has a record for fatalities then let us banish the automobile and resolve at once upon becoming a nation of mollycoddles.

Pestiferous Correspondents

During the war between Japan and Russia there was much dissatisfaction among newspaper correspondents because of the precautions that were taken by Japanese officials to prevent them from getting all the news they were after. The Japanese had a way of handling war correspondents that was at once novel and exasperating. They simulated great solicitude for the correspondents, and while promising them everything in the way of facilities for getting to the points where the war game was at its height they managed to keep them remote from the scenes they most desired to witness. In this way they were able to carry on their preparations and execute their designs without much danger of their movements being anticipated. The war was half over before the correspondents realized that in circumventing them the Japanese employed as much strategy as was exercised in maneuvers against the enemy. The correspondents lost their temper but the Japanese won the battles. Incidentally the Japanese taught the world a lesson, and now the General Staff of our army is considering ways and means of eliminating the problem that has hitherto entered into the war game as a result of the pernicious activity of newspaper correspondents. In the Spanish war the Government was much embarrassed by newspaper discussion of the plans of the army and navy. A single newspaper was more useful to the enemy than a whole corps of spies. How to avert a recurrence of this species of treason is the question that the General Staff has under consideration. And a question of considerable delicacy it is in this land of the free and home of the yellow journal. The average politician would not dare to entertain offhand a proposition to establish a press censorship. Even in war the press of the Republic must have its swing though lives be sacrificed and carnage prolonged. Hence the General Staff in considering ways and means of minimizing the evil consequences of newspaper enterprise and rivalry conceives it to be prudent to conciliate the press before urging any kind of legislation. There is talk of protecting newspaper correspondents in "their rights and privileges" and "soliciting the co-operation of the press of the country." Before attempting to persuade Congress of the desirability of legislation on this subject the General Staff will endeavor to obtain the consent of the newspapers. All of which as news must be very amusing to the benighted of the Orient.

Affinitarian Philosophy

Although affinities are tolerably numerous in this country and although the sensational exploitation of divorce trials in the yellow journals would lead one to believe that the affinitarian relation is having more and more of the dirt of disgrace rubbed off, the United States cannot boast of a serious propaganda for the facilitating of extra-marital sexual relations. In this respect Germany is far in the lead for that country has an association boasting branches in every part of the empire which advocates laws by which marriages may be dissolved as soon as "the soul communion" ceases. Perhaps it is significant that socialism is rampant in the country which has originated this propaganda, for it is a short step from the system which would give the State the right to control a man's property to the system which would give the State the right to form his conscience. The new affinitarian philosophy would do this by formulating a new code of morals and enforcing it by law. The ladies and gentlemen who head the propaganda started by asking themselves whether the relation of the sexes is forever to be determined by existing marriage arrangements. They immediately answered the question in the negative. So they would substitute for the matrimonial union blessed by the church or sanctioned by the law "a real soul communion of two persons." They would allow a man to select his mate "in accordance with the demands of his nature." When a "soul communion" had ceased to satisfy "the demands of a man's nature," he would be allowed to discontinue it and seek another soul mate. With wonderful forethought these philosophers have provided against the danger of promiscuous relations and endless divorces by suggesting that dissatisfied soul mates should be required to apply twice for a separation, an interval of four weeks to elapse between the first and the second application. It is a simple problem in arithmetic to compute how many soul mates a man might annually acquire by this arrangement for the satisfaction of the demands of his nature. The propagandists insist that the rights of children would have to be safeguarded but do not point out just how this could be done. Neither have they shown conclusively whether it would be the spiritual or the fleshly part of his nature which would influence man in taking and putting away soul mates. Of course this system should not be taken seriously, but just the same it is being so taken by thinkers of anarchic tendencies. Unfortunately such thinkers, shallow though they usually be, address remarkably large audiences of sympathetic hearers nowadays when they put their thoughts into language. The advantage of abolishing one of the sternest commands of the decalogue has been apparent to a certain class of men and women in all ages but it has remained for twentieth century Germany to clothe this pernicious form of libertine teaching in philosophical formulas and to ask men and women to enroll themselves in an association devoted to the fleshly propaganda.

The Unexpected Peril

Unlike the youth that all men say
  They prize—youth of abounding blood,
In love with the sufficient day,
  And gay in growth, and strong in bud;

Unlike was mine! Then my first slumber
  Nightly rehearsed my last; each breath
Knew itself one of the unknown number.
  But Life was urgent with me as Death.

My shroud was in the flocks; the hill
  Within its quarry locked my stone;
My bier grew in the woods; and still Life spurred me where I paused alone.

"Begin!" Life called. Again her shout,
  "Make haste while it is called today!"
Her exhortations plucked me out,
  Hunted me, turned me, held me at bay.

But if my youth is thus hard pressed
  (I thought) what of a later year?
If the End so threats this tender breast,
  What of the days when it draws near?

Draws near, and little done? Yet lo,
  Dread has forborne, and Haste lies by.
I was beleaguered; now the foe
  Has raised the siege, I know not why.

I see them troop away; I ask
  Were they in sooth mine enmies—
Terror, the doubt, the lash, the task?
  What heart has my new housemate, Ease?

How am I left, at last, alive,
  To make a stranger of a tear?
What did I do one day to drive
  From one the vigilant angel, Fear?

The diligent angel, Labor? Ay,
  The inexorable angel, Pain?
Menace me, lest indeed I die,
  Sloth! Turn, crush, teach me fear again!

—Alice Meynell.

Perspective Impressions

A motto for the new year: Abate desire and practice charity.

"I regard God as a universal personality," says Dr. Lyman Abbott, thus giving color to the suspicion that he has faith in the divinity of Roosevelt.

To be able to say, "I told you so," is doubtless gratifying to Peary, but if he had been able to say less on his return from the North he would now be more of a hero in the eyes of the people.

The Muses are beckoning Mayor Taylor to Elysian fields, but he hates to go—on foot. It is hard to shake off the automobile habit that is acquired at the expense of taxpayers.

The question ought not to be, What will the new year bring us? but, What shall we contribute?

"If I were to go back into the steel business," says Mr. Andrew Carnegie, "I would put an end to labor troubles by sharing profits with my employes." But when Mr. Carnegie was in the steel business he always ended labor troubles with shot guns in the hands of the Pinkertons. In those days fair words buttered no parsnips.

Mr. Heney says he filed his libel suit in New York because owing to the division of the people of this city in hostile camps it is impossible to obtain an impartial jury. For himself Mr. Heney wants an impartial jury but for others he prefers the Burns patented variety, guaranteed to eat out of a comminatory hand.

Remarks on Chesterton on Shaw

A Brief Discussion of the Englishman's New Treatise on the Irishman, Conducted in Feeble Imitation of the Chestertonian or Jigsaw Style

By Edward F. O'Day

"Most people either say that they agree with Bernard Shaw or that they do not understand him. I am the only person who understands him, and I do not agree with him." In this manner Gilbert K. Chesterton begins his essay on George Bernard Shaw, an excellent manner, it must be admitted, if the end be, in so beginning, to arrest the attention of those who are merely curious and contrary. For the curious or contrary man will be impelled to read the book for the purpose of confounding the author and certainly any reader, properly challenged, may cover any author with confusion. It is so easy to lay the book down with the statement that the author has been at great pains to make himself out a liar; and to prove the truth of the lie thus launched one has only to take the book up again and show, from many passages, that Chesterton does not understand Shaw but that he does agree with him. Why may not a reader say: "Go to, Chesterton, you deliberately misunderstand Shaw and you do agree with him with all the intensity of your misunderstanding."

I have heard Chesterton accused of conceit in so beginning his book and I consider the charge quite ridiculous. By that opening statement Chesterton shows himself, not a conceited person but the humblest man of letters in England. Surely it is humility and not conceit to confess oneself so beholden to another that one must ape his mannerisms. Could one more strikingly testify to one's own deficiency of mental equipment? And that is just what Chesterton has done, for that opening paragraph is not Chesterton's but Shaw's. The hand is the hand of Chesterton but the voice is the voice of Shaw; if Shaw had not uttered innumerable such impertinences Chesterton would never have thought of this one. To have thought of it would have been no reflection on Chesterton's mental capacity; every man who reads a Shaw play thinks of Shavian epigrams; but most men are too conceited to utter them. That would be an intolerable tribute to Shaw's compelling mentality; it would be confessing, not only that Shaw makes one think but also that he makes one think in Shavian terms and ordinary conceit is inconsistent with such a humiliating admission. But Chesterton not only thought this Shaw impertinence; he also uttered it and in uttering it, proved himself the humblest of imitators. I do not say that Chesterton is not proud; my point is that he certainly is not conceited, but very humble. In his humility he may be as proud as Shaw and Shaw, as everybody should realize by this time, is as proud on his pillar as Simon Stylites was on his.

So I do not agree with those who censure Chesterton for beginning his book with the statement which I have quoted. The statement may be untrue; in fact I am convinced that it is untrue; but it is not conceited. My censure for that statement is directed, not against Chesterton, but against Chesterton's publisher, John Lane. Not that I blame Lane for including the statement in the book; certainly not. I blame him for taking it out of the book and plastering it on the bill boards and displaying it in newspaper advertisements and forcing it on unwilling attention in special "write-ups" sent through the mails to literary critics. Somewhere in his book Chesterton defends Shaw against the charge of being a meretricious advertiser and meanwhile John Lane is meretriciously advertising Chesterton's book on Shaw by billing two continents with this ridiculous paragraph which has as much to do with Chesterton's book on Shaw as Shaw's Major Barbara has to do with Chesterton's private life. The paragraph is in Chesterton's book because Chesterton in his extreme humility placed it there; in the book but not of it. John Lane should have left it there. He would have been much better occupied in making for Chesterton and for Chesterton's readers a book which would stand the wear and tear of one reading. Chesterton has cut a fine jewel but John Lane has set it execrably.

Chesterton has seen fit to approach Bernard Shaw by a winding path of analysis. He will not allow us to step up and shake hands with Shaw until he has taken us aside and dissected Shaw's character for us. This would be an embarrassing method of introduction if Chesterton were actually presenting you or me to Shaw. In that case the embarrassment would be for Shaw and for you or me; in the present case Chesterton covers himself with embarrassment. He says that there are three traditions embodied in Shaw: the Irishman, the Puritan and the Progressive; and then, with true Chestertonian hardihood, he essays to explain them. There are some writers who, one imagines, are competent to explain the Irish, the Puritanical and the Progressive traditions in Bernard Shaw, if indeed these traditions are in him; but I do not think Chesterton is exactly the man. Perhaps that is why he attempts the task, for Chesterton is never so blithe as when attempting the impossible. The difficulty of the task may be surmised when it is stated that Chesterton is not an Irishman, not a Puritan and not a Progressive. He is an Englishman, a Catholic and a Reactionary. He was born to the English tradition as Shaw to the Irish; he acquired the Reactionary tradition as Shaw the Progressive; but unlike Shaw who, he says, was a Puritan before he was born, Chesterton is becoming a Catholic in preparation for death. Just now he is on the verge, not of death (thank God!) but of Catholicism, and his friends are trying to topple him over. But Chesterton is a large man—in this book he compares himself to an elephant—and it is tedious toppling.

It would require a book as large as Chesterton's on Shaw to prove that Chesterton is incapable of appraising Shaw in his three-fold tradition. He goes very far afield in his exposition of his thesis. Thus, to prove that Shaw is an Irishman he compares him to the Venus de Milo, a comparison which only an Irishman can properly appreciate. I wonder if an Irishman suggested it to Chesterton, the Englishman? Possibly George Moore. In that case the comparison is particularly piquant, for of course Moore would like to insinuate that Shaw is like the Venus de Milo because that lady has no arms and therefore cannot write. But the comparison is a good one, although I think that Shaw is more like the Venus de Medici whose pose sly old Ovid so capitally described. Letting the comparison stand, we are somewhat taken aback to find that in the next paragraph Chesterton compares Shaw to Diana "who walks the wood with a sort of wild chastity." Now this will never do. Shaw may be like Venus or he may be like Diana, but he can hardly be like both of them. It is evident that Chesterton looks on Diana as a "huntress chaste and fair" and that he disbelieves that old scandal about Endymion. That being so, what have Venus and Diana in common except uncommon beauty? Certainly Chesterton was not drawing a comparison between the beauty of these divinities and his divinity, G. B. S. Even Chesterton does not dare to say that Shaw is beautiful. Imagine comparing an Irishman with a red beard and a suit of Jaeger to Venus

In Zaccarath

By Lord Dunsany

"Come," said the King in sacred Zaccarath, "and let our prophets prophesy before us."

A far-seen jewel of light was the holy palace, a wonder to the nomads on the plains.

There was the King with all his under-lords, and the lesser kings that did him vassalage, and there were all his queens with all their jewels upon them.

Who shall tell of the splendor in which they sat; of the thousand lights and the answering emeralds; of the dangerous beauty of that hoard of queens or the flash of their laden necks?

There was a necklace there of rose-pink pearls beyond the art of dreamer to imagine. Who shall tell of the amethyst chandeliers where torches, soaked in rare Bhyrinian oils, burned and gave off a scent of blethany?*

Enough to say that when the dawn came up it appeared by contrast pallid and unlovely and stripped all bare of its glory, so that God covered it with rolling clouds.

"Come," said the King, "let our prophets prophesy."

Then the heralds stepped through the ranks of the King's silk-clad warriors who lay oiled and scented upon velvet cloaks, with a pleasant breeze among them caused by the fans of slaves; even their casting-spears were set with jewels; through their ranks the heralds went with mincing steps, and came to the prophets, clad in brown and black, and one of them they brought and set him before the King. And the King looked at him and said, "Prophesy unto us."

And the prophet lifted his head, so that his beard came clear from his brown cloak, and the fans of the slaves that fanned the warriors wafted the tip of it a little awry. And he spake to the King and spake thus:

"Woe unto thee, King, and woe unto Zaccarath. Woe unto thee and woe unto thy women; for your fall shall be sore and soon. Already in Heaven the gods shun thy god: They know his doom and what is written of him; he sees oblivion before him like a mist. Thou hast aroused the hate of the mountaineers. They hate thee all along the crags of Droom. The evilness of thy days shall bring down the Zeedians on thee as the suns of springtide bring the avalanche down. They shall do unto Zaccarath as the avalanche doth unto the hamlets of the valley." When the queens chattered or tittered among themselves, he merely raised his voice and still spake on: "Woe to these walls and the carven things upon them. The hunter shall know the camping-places of the nomads by the marks of the camp-fires on the plain, but he shall not know the place of Zaccarath."

A few of the recumbent warriors turned their heads to glance at the prophet when he ceased. Far overhead the echoes of his voice hummed on awhile among the cedarn rafters.

"Is he not splendid?" said the King. And many of that assembly beat with their palms upon the polished floor in token of applause. Then the prophet was conducted back to his place at the far end of that mighty hall; and for a while musicians played on marvelous curved horns, while drums throbbed behind them hidden in a recess. The musicians were seated cross-legged on the floor all blowing their huge horns in the brilliant torchlight, but as the drums throbbed louder in the dark they arose and moved slowly nearer to the King. Louder and louder drummed the drums in the dark, and nearer and nearer moved the men with the horns, so that their music should not be drowned by the drums before it reached the King.

A marvelous scene it was when the tempestuous horns were halted before the King, and the drums in the dark were like the thunder of God, and the queens were nodding their heads in time to the music, with their diadems flashing like heavens of falling stars, and the warriors lifted their heads and shook, as they lifted them, the plumes of those golden birds which hunters wait for by the Liddian lakes, in a whole lifetime killing scarcely six, to make the crests that the warriors wore when they feasted in Zaccarath. Then the King shouted and the warriors sang—almost they remembered then old battle-chaunts. And, as they sang, the sound of the drums dwindled and the musicians walked away backwards, and the drumming became fainter and fainter as they walked, and altogether ceased, and they blew no more on their fantastic horns. Then the assemblage beat on the floor with their palms. And afterwards the queens besought the King to send for another prophet. And the heralds brought a singer and placed him before the King; and the singer was a young man with a harp. And he swept the strings of it, and when there was silence he sang of the iniquity of the King. And he foretold the onrush of the Zeedians and the fall and the forgetting of Zaccarath and the coming again of the desert to its own and the playing about of little lion cubs where the courts of the palace had stood.

"Of what is he singing?" said a queen to a queen.

"He is singing of everlasting Zaccarath."

As the singer ceased the assemblage beat listlessly on the floor, and the King nodded to him and he departed.

When all the prophets had prophesied to them and all the singers sung, that royal company arose and went to other chambers, leaving the hall of festival to the pale and lonely dawn. And alone were left the lion-headed gods that were carven out of the walls; silent they stood and their rocky arms were folded. And shadows over their faces moved like curious thoughts as the torches flickered and the dull dawn crossed the fields. And the colors began to change in the chandeliers.

Never was greater splendor or a more famous hall. When the queens went away through the curtained door with all their diadems it was as though the stars should arise in their stations and troop together to the West at sunrise.

And only the other day I found a stone that had undoubtedly been a part of Zaccarath; it was three inches long and an inch broad; I saw the edge of it uncovered by the sand. I believe that only three other pieces have been found like it.

A California Bee Farm

This is the Story of a Veteran New England School Teacher Who, Sighing for Green Hills Far Away, Was Invited to Join a Girlhood Friend in the San Joaquin Valley Where She is Now Engaged in the Beekeeping Industry

As I was transferred from the Southern Pacific Overland to the valley flyer, the conductor gazed at my ticket with a dubious smile.

"Ever been there?" he queried.

"No, I'm just from the East."

"Well, you'll think you've struck the jumping off place, sure, when you see Cando. Section house, water tank and salt grass plain—that's the whole show."

There was no station. The train slowed to let me down on the track, one or two passengers looked pityingly after me, my trunks came tumbling out of the baggage car and the train swept off. I had arrived.

Slush and east winds were holding high carnival in New England. Here the grass was wearing o' the green in a style that would have delighted the heart of good St. Patrick. Cattle were dotted over the plain, there were lines of willows along the irrigation ditches and magnificent oaks in the distance.

The Sierra Nevada lifted great snow crowned peaks in the east, and in the west was the purple barrier of the Coast Range. It was a country of immense ranches, wide vineyards and orchards. A few whitewashed buildings dazzling in the morning sunshine suggested homes.

I had not done snuffing the peculiar sweet, burnt smell of the alkali, when with joyful greetings my friend, her husband and the children swept around the water tank. They had made the passage in the Lizzie Olsen, the big farm wagon, named for a sailing craft familiar in old home days. The Lizzie Olsen played a star part in our ranch life.

My friends had been busy in my behalf, and it was not long before we reached the bee subject.

"This is an alfalfa and cattle ranch," announced the rancher, "and the Fresno county bee inspector says that it is a first class location for an apiary. We have one hundred acres of alfalfa and a great quantity of alkali weed on the cattle range, to say nothing of the wild flowers and tree blossoms, all of which give excellent bee food.

"We've heard of a first class apiary for sale, seventy-five hives, and a practical bee man will purchase twenty-five of those hives and add them to his small apiary, provided that I allow him hive location here. You can purchase the other fifty. He will manage the one hundred hives and you can learn the bee business by helping to look after your own apiary. The bee man will live in a tent near the apiary and help on the farm. His wife also has a practical knowledge of apiary work."

"I shall live in a tent, too," I chortled.

"Wait," my host cautioned, "until you hear the other propositions in regard to learning the bee business."

I heard them, but they did not appeal to me.

The spot chosen for the apiary was a high knoll safe from floods. There was a deep pond near and a clump of immense willows, beside which the tents were pitched.

Location near good water is an apiary essential. Bees are great water drinkers, and if stock trough or household pump has to be depended upon for water supply the bees become a nuisance.

We purchased the apiary outright, bees and hives, for $5 each for the hived colony. The hives come fitted in sections ready for a carpenter to put together; by buying the sections about 40 cents may be saved on each hive. There was no carpenter in our neighborhood and we willingly took both colonies and hives and thus avoided worry and delay.

The hives were square boxes and the Lizzie Olsen transported them in the night. Bees go to bed early, and by stopping up the door of the hive they are kept inside.

It was April 5 when they arrived at Beeknoll, and the quiet spot was, in the morning, fairly vibrant with their humming. The 100 hives were set out in rows three feet apart. This allowed plenty of room for the apiarist. The grass had been cut and the ground made ready, so that there would be no need to disturb them later.

We had our last rain for the season on April 11, and from that date until November was one long period of sunshine and flowers.

My first apiary work was to follow the bee man in opening up the hives and in changing the brood combs. It requires some courage, coolness, patience and nimble fingers to make a success in apiculture.

We of course dressed for the part, with veils and rubber gloves, and I added an old light rubber mackintosh. Armed with a bee smoker I was well equipped to meet trouble, and it was there waiting to be met.

Blessed is the man who found out that smoke will reduce hostile bees to submission. After a gust from the smoker we removed the tops of the hives, examined the movable frames, and when necessary replaced comb foundations. Our hives were being run for extracted honey, consequently all preparations for swarming were promptly suppressed.

The queen was clipped. This has a very disheartening effect upon the plans of the royal lady. The bee man carefully examined the frames until he found her. He then seized her by the wing, with the thumb and forefinger of the left hand. Her little feet promptly clasped his finger, but the queen stings only those of her own royal blood.

With a pair of blunt scissors he clipped the free wing off, close to the body. Writing about this performance and doing the deed are different matters. The queen herself is docile, but her subjects until smoked into stupidity are as furious and hostile as Filipinos.

There are ten combs in each hive. They are loose fitting and suspended a bee space apart. The comb foundation is purchased in sheets which are cut into narrow strips and fastened to the frames. Comb foundation is a wily encouragement to the busy bee and an exact starter for building.

Some of the hives were fitted with honey boards. A honey board is a frame covered with zinc, with holes big enough to allow worker bees to pass through, but too small for the queen. Its object is to keep the brood below.

We had just finished the examination of the hives when the bee inspector included our apiary in his rounds. His marking eye, on the alert for foul brood and immovable combs, brightened at the absolute cleanliness and first class condition of our apiary.

What is foul brood?

The inspector says that it is the meanest enemy that the apiarist has to contend with. It is highly contagious and attacks the young brood in the cells. The larvae in the open cells turn black, the caps of sealed cells sink or break, and the contents change into a black, ropy jelly with an offensive smell.

Like so many other pests of modern times, foul brood is due to a microbe. The bees carry the spores from hive to hive, the disease spreads rapidly, and in a very short time a whole apiary will be infected. The bee inspector burns infected hives and bees. It means a heavy loss to the apiarist, but if foul brood were not summarily dealt with there would soon be an end of apiculture in the valley.

By the middle of May I was comfortably settled in my

Our Anvil Chorus

Hark! What awful hullabaloo is this that strikes upon the ear like the rolling of distant thunder or that crash of sonorous metal that once brought fright to Chaos and Old Night? It is the anvil chorus of our dear old parish proclaiming now in the broken rhythms of angry waves on a rockbound coast, poignant vexation of spirit; and now, in horrendous dissonances, as of an army of discontented souls grumbling at their experience of the hereafter, protesting against the pricks of disappointment. It is the opening anvil chorus of the Panama Canal Exposition in a symphony that reminds us that the spirit of the old town is unchanged. What would San Francisco be without its dear old anvil chorus? It would be like society without Mrs. Grundy, a slave to its impulses, insensible of its follies. How refreshing and heartening therefore to know that the anvil chorus is still puissant and willing and quick to respond to provocation! The signal for its latest bravura was the publication of the names of the gentlemen who have been chosen for the ways and means committee of the exposition. It is a big committee, but it doesn't include everybody, and hence these brays.

A Trio of Big Ones

Monday morning the daily newspapers, which have been taken in on the ground floor to insure their cooperation, published the names of the committeemen, and by noon the town was in an uproar. Great and detonating was the indignation of prominent citizens who had been sidetracked. Insistent and threatening was the demand for information as to who made up the list. The finger of suspicion soon pointed to that arch-manipulator of everything worth while, the Hon. Gavin McNab. The McNabs, it was said, had undertaken to run the whole show, and were handling preliminaries as they would the details of an air-tight political convention. Early in the day some of Charles S. Wheeler's friends were heard complaining that he had been omitted from the list. They had been assured that he would be one. He was one of the men for whom a strong fight had been made, for be it known there was considerable wire-pulling for appointment to the committee. The friends and admirers of Rudolph Spreckels were also indignant, nay, outraged, for his claims to recognition had been disallowed along with those of James D. Phelan, our most distinguished citizen.

Other Tragic Omissions

Judge Dunne, it is said, threw one of his conniption fits when he read the list and found that there had been discrimination against his brother "Jim" who keeps a grog-shop and in favor of Harry Flannery who deals in retail liquors. He is inclined to hold Tommy Hickey responsible, as it is known that Hickey as a leader of the Democracy was permitted to put on some of his henchmen and to have the public administrator's office represented through his partner Eustace Cullinan. Perhaps the most prodigious roar that emanated from any quarter was that which rose in Weinstock & Lubin's store. Nowhere on the list could be found the name of Harris Weinstock, "humanitarian, philanthropist and student of labor conditions." While it would have been bad enough to sidetrack this eminent citizen, said his friends, it was like adding insult to injury to put on two of the irrepressible Hale brothers. And thus the anvil chorus ranged up and down the scale, emitting a tremendous volume of sound and contributing to the gaiety of the parish. The effect on the McNabs was imperceptible. Admitting that they are responsible for the committee, have they not turned out a good job? No unprejudiced person will deny that the committee is representative of the city's commercial interests or that it is lacking in men of ability and enthusiasm.

The Successful McNabs

The McNabs, by the way, are coming to the front with something of the triumphant air of the Campbells. The ramifications of their influence are interminable. They have taken a hold on affairs with a firm grasp. They have given proof of inexhaustible energy and enthusiasm, and they have shown wonderful dexterity in laying hold on opportunity without letting occasion slip. It is certainly to our advantage to have such men contributing their energies to the exposition project. Gavin McNab is the most successful political boss this State has ever known; successful not by reason of political triumphs but by reason of his masterly manipulation of politics to his own advantage. This he has done without employing any of the familiar discreditable methods which are the only methods available to the typical boss of inferior intelligence. With McNab party management is merely a means to an end outside of the political sphere. His successes have come to him in the practice of law and in the financial world. He is today supplying the gray matter for more than one bank and the shrewdness required in many enterprises, and in Bradstreet's he is rated at one million and a half. James McNab is now chairman of the Chamber of Commerce, and a third brother, John McNab, is soon coming to town to take the position of United States District Attorney, arrangements to that end having been promptly perfected upon its becoming known that "Bob" Devilin intended to resign the office to go into private practice. So, the McNabs are coming. Turn on the bagpipes!

McAdie, Weather Seer and Poet

My belief that Alexander McAdie, the local weather prophet, is also a poet has abided with me so long that I cannot remember just when I acquired it. Probably it sprang within my breast on the first of many pleasant occasions when I sought him out in his eyrie on the roof of the Merchants' Exchange building to interview him on weather conditions. Newspapers send to consult the weather man on the numerous "hottest" and "coldest" days of the year that are a boon to city editors and cartoonists when "human interest stories" are scarce. Whenever it was my good fortune to receive one of these assignments, I went with pleasurable anticipation mixed with slight misgiving—pleasurable anticipation because I knew that Mr. McAdie would discourse of the weather as beautifully as ever poet sang of the skylark, and with misgiving because I realized that he would convince me that my private ideas of hot and cold days were ridiculously disarranged. Mr. McAdie would speak so softly of atmospheric pressure and wind currents, would infuse such warmth into the scientific discussion of bitter cold and bring such a cooling draught of eloquence to the topic of oppressive heat that I always went away from his "ivory tower" feeling that the thermometer and the barometer were instruments of malicious deception. It was not that alone which convinced me that Mr. McAdie was a poet. When the weather was bad he would paint such glowing pictures of the good weather to come and when the weather was tolerably good, of the infinitely better weather in store that I knew he had been nurtured by the muse. Imagination glowed in his every utterance. But now I have more matter-of-fact proof that Mr. McAdie is a poet. Perhaps seer is a better word, if it adequately renders the meaning of the term "vates" which the Latins applied to one who was both prophet and poet. That of course is just what Mr. McAdie is.

McAdie's Prose Poems

My matter-of-fact proof comes in the shape of a pretty little volume which that renowned local patron of all true poets, Alexander M. Robertson, has published for Mr. McAdie. The volume contains three poetical essays in prose entitled respectively, Infra Nubem, The Lights Outside and La Bocana. Perhaps it would be better to call them, not poems in prose, but poems in blank verse cast in prose form, a very awkward but more exact designation. Mr. McAdie celebrates his beloved city, looking down upon it from the hills when "like the merciful mantle of charity, the fog covers our many sins." He celebrates also the Golden Gate, telling us, in his great affection, that the title does dubious honor to the glorious hues reflected in its waters. "More fitting did we call it Gate of Light," he sings. To read these little essays is to realize that Mr. McAdie, in his lonely watch tower, has lost none of the poetry of the heavens and of the earth and waters which he scans for weather signs. His scientific labor is but an avocation; poetry is his real vocation. It is too bad therefore that Mr. McAdie should have pretended to use prose as his medium. The pretense is but poorly sustained at times, as when he writes in language which any school boy can scan, (speaking of the fog), "Inland it spreads, and spreading rarer grows, a thin gray line, to die at last—if but the eye could see—upon the burnished wheat fields of the San Joaquin." Or again: "Lover of the City, is there no lesson in this twofold aspect of the fog? Seen in the humdrum sweep of daily life, in the rush and routine of the business day, your fellow citizens are somber-hued and unattractive. Seen from a higher vantage ground, fling they not back the genial warmth of their humanity, the sunlight of their truer selves?" From which it appears that Mr. McAdie is a moralist as well as a poet. But I hope that Mr. McAdie will not disguise his poetical quality under the cloak of a very gauzy prose when he next favors us with his meditations from on high. A poet, unlike a weather prophet, is sometimes honored in his own community. The little book shows Robertson's craft at its happiest. A fine hand-made paper with noble margins and vellum boards—here is a dress fit for any poet. Besides there is a frontispiece in colors by Arthur F. Mathews and the marginal decorations are from the gifted pen of Lucia K. Mathews. Mosher never made a better book.

I need the money but you can have it if you promise not to keep it long.

Don't worry, old chap; I'll spend it today.

California's Greatest Son

Mr. William R. Hearst has come to California to spend the holidays in the bosom of his family. Noiselessly he slipped into town, his coming was unproclaimed, his arrival caused no stir, and from the public prints evoked but scant comment. Yet Mr. Hearst is today one of the most striking and impressive figures in the public life of the nation. No private citizen of this Republic ever wielded greater influence than is exercised by William R. Hearst through the columns of his daily papers and magazines. Public opinion gives force and effect to all the institutions of our country, and upon this instrument Mr. Hearst plays with all the skill of a virtuoso, rendering it hardly less responsive to his subtle touch than is the violin to the magical bowing of a passionate master. Slowly our statesmen and philosophers have come to realize that as a result of the artful insinuation of socialistic ideas into the public mind through the medium of the Hearst newspapers, public sentiment has been gradually revolutionized within a decade. They have at length begun to take him almost as seriously as he deserves. Now they are trying to understand him, to analyze his character and motives, but it is evident from their floundering that he is an enigma beyond their puny powers of solution.

His Resemblance to Satan

In the December number of Current Literature several pages are devoted to a discussion of what is termed "The Satanic Majesty of William R. Hearst." We are told that his personal power was never made more manifest than by his crushing defeat of Tammany; also that "he thrives upon defeat" and that "no force that can be brought against him appears capable of doing more than defeat him, for it cannot crush and annihilate him." It is suggested that he and the Satan of Paradise Lost have many things in common. "Indomitability in defeat is but one thing; Hearst, like Satan is above all things a leader of revolt, and like Satan he is a magnificent egotist, fighting for personal power." By way of assisting us in the study of his character we are told of some of his maxims and peculiarities. For example it is related of him that he once said that he did not want any prominent men associated with him because he would have to consult them and he would consult only those persons who were employed by him. His fundamental economic idea, it is said, is that if special privileges are abolished opportunities will be equal. He believes that a great democratic wave is sweeping over the country, and he admits that "he is ambitious to be to it what Jefferson, Jackson and Lincoln were to the movement in their day." Notwithstanding the comparison made between Mr. Hearst and his Satanic Majesty the article in Current Literature is decidedly respectful, indeed, encomiastic, in tone. The analysis of Mr. Hearst is in the style of the conscientious historian intent upon elucidating the psychology of conduct that made epochs in ages past. He is pictured as a man of austere habits and no petty vices, something of a recluse who shuns society and has no taste for cards, liquor or tobacco; in a measure, a man of abnormal temperament, and, most wonderful of all, though radical, nay revolutionary in his preachments, maintaining the while, that he is "really conservative, almost reactionary in a sense."

His Enigmatic Personality

Doubtless Mr. Hearst derives a great deal of amusement from the efforts of his contemporaries to slit the veil that drapes his bewildering personality. There is one thing about Mr. Hearst more striking than every other element of that simple nature of his that seems so complex to those in whom he has excited interest and curiosity. That thing is his sense of humor. Mr. Hearst is a practical joker with a nation for his toy. He is a colossal cut-up smiling cynically on a credulous world. He is like the philosopher who laughs because he alone escapes being duped. The difficulty that is experienced in analyzing Mr. Hearst is due to an enormous misapprehension; it is supposed that he has something definite in view whereas he is only keeping himself in the public eye and reveling in the intoxication of political and social strife. He is the most misunderstood man in the United States, and his chief aim in life is to avoid being apprehended and thus becoming commonplace. He is a puzzle to men who seek to comprehend his political principles because he hasn't any. This ought to be evident to anybody who has observed him in his widely separated geographical spheres of action. More than once we have seen him stand for one thing in New York and its antithesis in San Francisco. Indeed we have seen him stand for two conflicting principles in one week in our very midst.

An Appreciation of Genius

But let it not be supposed that because Mr. Hearst is not a stickler for political principle he is not a man of worth. It is a mistake to suppose that one's attitude toward political principle is a final test of personal character. Great men have espoused political principles for the purpose of concealing benign designs for which a foolish people had not been prepared. Mr. Hearst may be imbued with the benign purpose of teaching the people that all is vanity and that the sooner they quit taking politicians seriously the better off they will be. But whatever his purpose it is certain that he has no delusions about politics. He is unquestionably giving impetus to the democratic wave that is sweeping over the country, but with him democracy is neither a passion nor a prejudice. He is too much of a philosopher, too well read in history to suppose that unrestrained democracy, in other words, Demos in the saddle, can ever realize the dreams of doctrinaire political scientists. Whatever zeal he has for democracy is logical, not to say sordid. It is inspired by his selfish interest in his newspapers. The more democracy we have, the more powerful will our press become, and whatever augments the power of the press is water on Mr. Hearst's wheel. But on the other hand the rule of the pen leads to the rule of the sword, and of that Mr. Hearst is also sensible, and he is not consumed with a passion for a military despotism. The simple truth is that our colossal cut-up is as unhampered by principle in his political exploits as he was when he precipitated the Spanish war. Like Disraeli he is ever conscious of the humorous side of politics, and like Voltaire he takes cynical delight in whatever illustrates the credulity of man. He cares neither for consistencies in his opinions old or new, nor for consistency of his position with itself at any one period of his career. And such is his genius and resourcefulness that in the course of his political career he has veered round to opposite sides of the compass without affecting his influence. His enemies can never confute him by dwelling on his inconsistencies. It is said that the highest order of pure intellect is incapable of intolerant and inflexible political partisanship, and this is illustrated in the case of Mr.

Hearst, a man indubitably of the highest intellectual power and never static in politics. The secret of his success in sustaining himself as a national figure is that he is able to see over the heads of all the busy crowd beneath him and glimpse the shadows of coming events.

A Reform Candidate for Governor

The reformers of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League are very busily engaged in trying to induce Will Davis of Oakland to believe that he is the logical candidate for governor. It seems that they are having a difficult time of it. All the leaders of the movement are bearing down upon Davis with coaxing smiles and curry combs, but Davis is obdurate to date and refuses to be groomed for the race. Therein, it seems to me, does Davis show himself a mighty wise man. William R. Davis is well known in Alameda County and as respected as he is well known which is going some in that interesting little community. Once he was Mayor of Oakland and men of the most divergent views in politics across the bay will tell you today that he was a good mayor. Afterwards he conducted the water front litigation for Oakland and won his case after years of fighting against the Southern Pacific. But outside of Alameda County and the councils of the Lincoln-Roosevelt leaguers Davis is not well known. Even the man who winds the ferry clock confuses him with young Will Davis who is attorney for the Harbor Commission. In the South he would have to be introduced even to the politicians. Besides, Davis is not exactly a young man and he has been harping on one string for many years. His powers of eloquence have been exercised so long on the subject of machine domination of politics that he would undoubtedly make this the issue of his campaign, with what results it is unnecessary to point out. It seems to be taken for granted that Governor Gillett will enter the race against Charlie Curry and the reformers have roseate visions of the two stalwarts so splitting the vote that a reformer like Davis will nose in between. But Davis does not seem to think that he is the man to do the nosing and I am inclined to agree with him.

THE NEW COLUMBIA THEATRE

To be opened on Monday evening, January 10. The playhouse is located at the corner of Geary and Mason streets and is one of the finest structures of its kind in the country.

Gillett and the Reformers

The reformers, in other words the men to whom the pie-wagon is at present inaccessible, are not all enthusiastic over their prospects. They would like very much to see Governor Gillett eliminated from consideration, knowing as they do that as his term runs on his popularity waxes. In this respect he differs from any of his predecessors within the memory of the present generation. The only argument that the reformers can advance against Gillett is that he is not with them, but they realize that to be with them is not regarded as an essential condition to salvation. To be against them implies of course affinity with the powers of evil, but some of the anti-machine papers are intimating that they perceive indications of a plot on the part of the bosses to sidetrack Gillett. From this intimation it is inferred that the reformers are not sincere in imputing to the Governor servile devotion to the machine. But whatever be their judgment respecting him it is evident that he is the source of much uneasiness among them, and that he is intensifying their emotions by sawing wood in preference to yawping for publication. Attending as he is strictly to the business of the gubernatorial office, he cannot be regarded as a choice target for inspired criticism. The reformers with taste that is characteristic have attempted to draw the Governor's fire by fabricating interviews with members of his family,, but their efforts have been in vain, and for the present they are compelled to curb their impatience while awaiting developments.

The Passing of "Pat" Sheedy

Milo

Do you know what Quality means in a Turkish Cigarette? If not get a box of "MILO." Then, any other cigarette, and try same, side by side. You'll note the delicate, aromatic mildness of the "MILO." Mildness (yet with the richness in flavor) is what costs in Turkish Tobacco, and its just this that makes the Perfect Cigarette. You'll find it in No Other.

This perfection is obtained only by owning our own plantation in Turkey—the careful watchfulness from the seeding to the finished article.

THE SURBRUG COMPANY, New York City

in the eighties when he came hither as the manager of John L. Sullivan who was then on his tour of the world knocking out boxers in four rounds. At that time pugilism was under a ban in this city, but Sheedy, equipped with a letter of introduction to "Boss" Buckley from the boss of Tammany, had no difficulty in obtaining a permit for an exhibition in Mechanics Pavilion, on which occasion the memorable contest between Sullivan and Peek-a-boo Robinson occurred. About twelve years ago Sheedy went to Cairo where he opened up the Ghesireh Palace as a club for gamblers. In the winter months Cairo is crowded with wealthy English and American tourists, and Sheedy catered to their appetite for excitement and diversion with signal success. The Ghesireh Palace which had been the home of Ismail Pasha became famous as a gambling resort and club throughout the world. In this beautiful palace Sheedy Pasha, as he became known, entertained on a most sumptuous scale. He gave grand balls and exquisite suppers, and representatives of the most exclusive aristocracies were his guests.

The Stolen Gainsborough

Sheedy came into world-wide prominence in 1900 as a result of his being instrumental in recovering the stolen portrait of the Duchess of Devonshire, painted by Gainsborough. This picture was stolen in 1876 from the London art gallery of Thomas Agnew & Sons who had paid $53,000 for it, the highest price ever paid for a single picture at Christies. The theft was discussed by the press of Europe and of this country for years, and the police of all nations were engaged in the search for the thieves. In time the Pinkertons learned that the picture was stolen by Adam Worth, a famous crook who had vanished about the time of the theft. One day William Pinkerton met Sheedy, and told him that Worth was the man for whom the police were looking. "If you ever run across him," said Pinkerton, "I wish you would negotiate for the return of the picture." When the picture was restored to the owners Sheedy told his story as follows: "One day in 1898 I was standing in front of the Pera Palace Hotel in Constantinople when a Greek sporting man whom I knew came to me with a message stating that there was an American or an Englishman, he did not know which, who was in trouble. The Greek handed me a card on which was written '125 Clark street, Chicago, 1882, $2,000.' Things came back to me at once. I'd often wondered what had become of the man who had given me that $2,000. I started at once for the place where the Greek directed me and found Worth. His hair was long and his beard was matted. He told me his story. He had served a term of imprisonment in Turkey and had escaped. He said: 'Sheedy, my right name is Adam Worth, but I am known in London and throughout Europe as Harry Raymond.' He asked me to do one thing for him. I said I would if he would tell me the truth. I asked him if he knew anything about the stolen Duchess. He said he knew more about it than any other man in the world because he had got it." Sheedy and Worth left Constantinople and worked their way back by various routes to France. On the way Worth told Sheedy that the picture had always been a white elephant on his hands and that he wanted Sheedy to negotiate for its return. Sheedy got into communication with Pinkerton and through him he met Frank E. Froost of Scotland Yard. Later the picture was returned to Agnew's gallery.

The Bond Issue Campaign

The question whether San Francisco wants a municipal street railway will have been passed upon before this paper is off the press. At this time those vociferous dailies that have been urging the people to vote for the bonds are apparently elated at the prospect of a triumph. Great is their confidence in the persuasive power of bluster, balderdash and buncombe, unwavering is their conviction of the stupidity of the masses. From the beginning of the campaign they assumed without the slightest attempt at dissembling that those organs of the average citizen which ought to be in the service of intelligence are in reality the purblind agents of passion. The chief argument advanced in favor of the bond issue was that, as a municipal railway is not to the liking of the United Railroads therefore it must be evident that a municipal railway is a good thing. Incidentally it was vociferously asserted that a municipal railway would solve the transportation problem; how or when, it did not seem to matter; apparently it was deemed sufficient for the stupid public to be told that municipal ownership is in the nature of a catholicon, and that above all things it is characteristic of the highest sagacity to act at all times on the principle of cutting off a nose to spite a face. The campaign has aroused in me an intense curiosity. I am curious to know how many people are susceptible of argument employed by the palladiums of our liberties.

That White Elephant

The Examiner, it must be admitted, made good use of the white elephant that was trotted out early in the campaign to serve as a warning against the municipal railroad scheme. That white elephant was not a happy conception. It adorned a good parable, but it seemed to symbolize hostility to the interests of the public. It was naturally assumed that the white elephant was groomed by the United Railroads, and in this day and generation the people do not take their gospel from public service corporations. But the truth about the white elephant is that it bore no relation to the United Railroads. It was sired by that cultured gentleman, Horace G. Platt, who conducted the campaign against the bond issue as the representative of the bondholders of the Geary Street Railway Company. Mr. Platt is one of our most charming after-dinner speakers. In the years agone he had considerable experience in politics, but of late years he has spent most of his time in the Pacific-Union Club and consequently he has not been on intimate terms with the plain people.

Christine Nielson's Success

I am glad to record the New York success of Miss Christine Nielson, the pretty and talented young lady who sang at the Princess Theater not very long ago. Miss Nielson has been engaged by the Shuberts as prima donna in "The Belle of Brittany," a musical comedy in which Frank Daniels is starring at Daly's Theater. I understand that Miss Nielson has made good in emphatic fashion. One does not have to go back very far to the time when she was singing in the chorus at Idora Park. Denis O'Sullivan found her there, pronounced her voice and acting good and engaged her for "Peggy Machree" at the Princess. With that auspicious start Miss Nielson soon won a place in the affections of local theatergoers. Miss Nielson is the daughter of a policeman named Nelson who used to pester the police reporters at the old Hall of Justice with tales about his daughter's marvelous voice. The newspapermen did not take him seriously and were mightily surprised when they learned that "old man Nelson's" girl was the Christine Nielson whom the late lamented Irish singer picked out of the Idora chorus.

Hotel Menus in French

Why do our hotel managers print the menus in French as well as in English? This is a question which has puzzled me a great deal. I suppose French is the language of cookery as well as of love, but that is hardly a sufficient reason. Nor can it be for the accommodation of our French visitors. Our hotel keepers do not entertain more French travelers than German or Italian or Spanish travelers; yet the menus are not given in German or Italian or Spanish. Of course I know that in Sherry's and some other New York restaurants it has been the custom to print the menus in French (unaccented) for several years and I am aware that it is considered "chic" to talk French to the maitre d'hotel whose English is usually unimpeachable. Can it be that the hotel managers are imitating this knowing New York way, in order to give our fashionables another opportunity to emphasize their superiority to ordinary mortals? If that is the inwardness of this mystery I imagine that it will lead to many amusing blunders, for not a few of our fashionables are very shaky in their French. On the other hand I have yet to dine with any master of the French language who would use it in ordering an American dinner in an American hotel from a waiter who, undoubtedly knows more about the Rhine than the Seine.

Selma Lagerlof, Nobel Prize Winner

Selma Lagerlof, the gifted story teller who shares with August Strindberg the literary honors of modern Sweden, has just been awarded the Nobel prize of $40,000 for the "person who in literature has provided the most excellent work of an idealistic tendency." This great distinction which places her in a category with Sully-Prudhomme, Mommsen, Bjornson, Mistral, Echegaray, Sienkiewicz, Carducci, Kipling and Eucken, the writers who received former Nobel awards, will undoubtedly bring her works to the attention of many Americans to whom she is little more than a name. Selma Lagerlof is a woman of great genius upon whom her native land has lavished extraordinary honors and it is pleasant to think that she will now receive in this country the recognition of which she is worthy. Her outlook upon life is naive and optimistic and it has been said very happily that the spirit of a Swedish Peter Pan breathes in her. She looks upon the world, according to one critic, as though it were her first book of fairy tales and she is able to tell what she sees in such a way that even the old and worldy wise are made children again and hang on her lips, eager for every word of her absorbing tales. Her love embraces not only men and animals, but also inanimate things and her appeal is to the heart. "She paints people as the pious Fra Angelico in the cloister cell," one critic has declared; "she paints with snow white and heavenly blue colors over a shining gold background, and she is ever hearing the bells of San Pasquale."

How Inspiration Came to Her

Selma Lagerlof has told how she was affected when the inspiration of her first work took possession of her. Born in the province of Varmland, the home of Robin Goodfellow and of countless witches and trolls, she went in her twenties to a normal school in Stockholm. One day she was walking along the street, her thoughts upon a lecture she had just attended. "The lecture must have been about Bellman or Runeberg, because she thought of them and of the characters in their works. She thought to herself that Runeberg's martial heroes and Bellman's companions offered splendid opportunities for literary treatment. Then suddenly it occurred to her: 'The world of Varmland in which you have lived is no less original than that of Fredman and the others. If you can only give form to it your material offers as splendid opportunities as that of Runeberg or Bellman.' And so it happened that the Saga (her first book) first flashed upon her. When the vision came to her the ground seemed to sway beneath her feet. The whole long street seemed to rise high into the air and to sink again. She stood still until the houses had resumed their wonted appearance. She gazed with astonishment at the passer-by who walked calmy along, quite oblivious to the miracle." Part of that first book, published as a short story, won for her a prize of $1300 and from that time she has devoted herself to writing. Her fiftieth birthday this year was celebrated throughout Sweden and even in other countries. Schools, clubs, societies did her honor; all classes from the royal family to the peasants showed their appreciation. Selma Laferlof's principal books are: Gosta Berling's Saga, The Money of Mr. Arne, The Miracles of Antichrist, Tales, Christ Legends, Jerusalem and The Wonderful Adventures of Nils which has caused critics to rank her with Hans Christian Andersen.

The Awakening of Mrs. Deland

It would be difficult to decide which has been a greater surprise to New York—the sudden winning of Mrs. Atherton to the cause of suffrage which she formerly disdained, or the unexpected attack upon suffragists made by Mrs. Margaret Deland who was regarded as a friend to the movement. In the literary firmament Mrs. Deland shines as a star of the second magnitude while Mrs. Atherton belongs with the prouder luminaries, but even so it would puzzle Mrs. Belmont, I am sure, to determine whether the cause has gained in the conversion of Mrs. Atherton what it has lost in the defection of Mrs. Deland. Certainly Mrs. Deland is more emphatic in her disapproval of the suffragists than ever Mrs. Atherton was in the days that preceded her change of faith. Mrs. Atherton never ascended the rostrum to tell the suffragists why she did not like them, but Mrs. Deland has spoken before the great anti-suffrage association, the National League for the Civic Education of Women. And how she did speak! From her heart surely, for her words are words that burn and the unmistakeable ring of sincerity is everywhere about them. "Does woman realize the dangerous elements she is playing with?" demanded Mrs. Deland. "Is she willing to multiply by two the present ignorant and unconscientious vote? I oppose suffrage for all women as I oppose it for all men. I am not affected by that old saying, 'The hand that rocks the cradle is the hand that rules the world.' If the hand is not fit to cast the ballot it is not fit to rock the cradle."

Her Withering Comments

Decidedly Mrs. Deland must be reckoned with by the noble army of feminine uplifters. She does not think much of current feminine tendencies. She puts herself on record, for instance, as believing that in this broad land of ours there are altogether too many cradles containing neglected children who will not grow up to call their parents blessed. "If the modern woman has a chance to make society over," she declares, "she has also an opportunity to wreck it." She flays women for the "wild vulgarity of their silly hideous hats"; she disapproves of the college girl "who talks upon the subject of marriage and the birthrate while her mother blushes." She asks, "What have the mothers eaten that the daughters' teeth are set on edge?" She finds that girls know how to say 'I will' and 'I want' but not 'I ought'; and she believes that the family is becoming a secondary consideration with women. All of which has caused a pother that would daunt a woman of less courage than Mrs. Deland. But having thrown down the gauntlet it is certain that she will not retire from the lists. She is as militant as a suffragist.

A Question of Sanity

Among the pictures of the stalwarts photographed for the newspapers in poses expressive of devoted attachment to the municipal ownership project I noted the counterfeit presentment of Charles Eastin, the erstwhile leader of that element in the democratic party which foams at its collective mouth when Gavin McNab emits an epigram. Eastin has a personality containing elements of considerable originality and there are many good stories of which he is the subject. Several years ago Eastin was retained by a client who sued the city for a million dollars in damages because he had been detained in the insane ward of the City Hall. The city was represented by Daniel Webster Burchard who was one of City Attorney Bill Burke's main supports in those interesting days. Argument on demurrer before Judge Hunt brought forth a characteristic burst of oratory from Eastin. When he had torn the passions to tatters he concluded something like this: "Insane? My client insane? Your honor, my client is not insane. He is as sane as I am." Whereupon Burchard won his point by this simple rejoinder, greatly relished by the court: "Counsel declares that his client is as sane as he is. I believe him. But though I have always understood that insanity was hereditary, I now learn for the first time that it is contagious."

Yes, said the Parvenu, everything at the dinner was imported. The caviare was from Russia, the salmon from Alaska, the chestnuts from Italy, the pheasants from France and the salt—

What? Was the salt imported too?

Yes, sir; from Epsom.

Mr. Walkley on the American Drama

Mr. Walkley of the London Times, who is regarded as one of the foremost dramatic critics of England, was in New York for the opening of the New Theater and since his return to London has been writing some of his impressions of the American drama. On the whole his comments are calculated to flatter American conceit. He does not think, for instance, that the ordinary American drama is much inferior to the ordinary English drama. "Ordinary American and ordinary English drama," he says, "are both—ordinary. Yet there does seem to me to be this discernible distinction: that the American sort is a little more sentimental, more romantic, more melodramatic—in a word, more unsophisticated, than ours. Thus it has, as we should say, a certain 'old-fashioned' air. It is today more or less what ours was the day before yesterday. There are also slight differences in point of view, in local color, and in local idiom. But the subject-matter on both stages is very much the same." Again Mr. Walkley says that the American drama is "more naif" than the English drama. "Playgoers seem to be more credulous, less intent upon testing fiction by fact, more prone to forego the satisfaction of the real for the delight of the romantic."

His Views on Our Journalism

This same credulity Mr. Walkley finds illustrated outside the theater in the American newspapers. Here is the way he approaches this inexhaustible theme: "What is the typical American newspaper of today, with its ruthless sacrifice of accuracy to picturesqueness, with its persistent determination to make every piece of news a thrill, if not a great engine for romanticizing the events of every-day life? New Yorkers, you will sometimes hear, do not take these typical newspapers seriously, but the fact that they take them at all argues a certain naivete, a certain temperamental craving for the illusion that life is more 'two-pence colored' than it really is." It is too bad that Mr. Walkley did not particularize in making this criticism. It is such a broad one and has been made so frequently that it would have been illuminating server. What papers does Mr. Walkley mean? Surely he does not mean to say that the Herald, the Tribune, the Sun, the Times and the Evening Post sacrifice acto hear something more definite from so close an obcuracy to picturesqueness or that they make every piece of news a thrill. When he speaks of typical American newspapers he must refer to the American, the Journal and the World. These papers are typical, but not in the sense in which Mr. Walkley means; they are typical of only one of the many diverse forms of Americanism. Strangely enough Mr. Walkley and other British visitors ignore most of the other forms. Mr. Walkley pays many compliments to American newspaper interviewers; he says they are very pleasant courteous fellows, but adds: "My one complaint about them is that they are too modest; they insist on ascribing to the patient startlingly original and ornately expressed opinions on the matter in hand, which are entirely their own and for which they ought to get the credit.".

The Future of Our Drama

The opening of the New Theater gave Mr. Walkley an opportunity to discourse on the future of the American stage and on this subject he is fairly optimistic. "The New Theater scheme," he says, "to be rightly understood, must be seen as part of a great intellectual movement—a movement, of course, conspicous today all over the United States of America, whose citizens found universities and museums naturally as ours found families, but to be noted, I am assured, at its maximum energy in New York." Although he quotes the disquieting Spanish proverb, 'The house is finished and death enters,' he has high hopes for the New Theater and will not agree with those who say that American taste for real knowledge and connoisseurship in the matter of good drama is undeveloped and uninformed. There are many small things American to which Mr. Walkley does not extend his condescension; for instance, he seems to think it a rather ridiculous custom for physicians who attend the theater to leave their names and seat numbers at the box office in anticipation of emergency calls. But on the whole his views are of the sort which most Americans would prefer to accept rather than question. This does not mean that these views are sound but that they are complimentary.

Rare California Coins

For some reason difficult to explain coin collectors in this country were formerly indifferent buyers of rare gold pieces. They much preferred silver and copper issues. But now the rare gold coins of the country are eagerly sought after and enormous sums are paid for the prize specimens. For instance, an American collector named W. H. Woodin of New York recently paid the world's record price of $10,000 each for two $50 gold pieces minted in 1877. California coins of private mintage are very highly prized by the keenest collectors. The rare $10 piece issued in 1849 by the Cincinnati Mining and Trading Company in this State, for a specimen of which as much as $3,000 has been paid in recent years, did not excite much interest when a specimen was sold at an auction in 1887, only $51 being paid for it. If an 1849 $10 piece bearing the stamp of the Pacific Company, another California private minting firm, were to be offered for sale today it would fetch as much as the Cincinnati piece, and yet when offered at auction in 1884 one of these pieces with a radiated Liberty cap brought only $22. Even the much sought golden ingots of Moffat & Co., the first pieces of gold to pass current as money in California, were not regarded with more than casual interest by old time collectors. Specimens of these tiny bricks of gold brought as little as $26 in former years, and yet last year a similar gold brick of the denomination of $16 sold for $340. One of the rarest of American gold coins is the $5 gold piece made by the private minting firm of Dubosq & Co. in this city in 1850. In 1884 a specimen of this coin offered at auction brought only $6.40. That was the last and the only time the Dubosq $5 piece has been offered for sale. As a matter of fact the specimen sold is the only one of which there is any record. Even the mint cabinet at Philadelphia does not contain one of those pieces. It is not known where this solitary specimen is now. Its value can only be guessed at.

Fireman's Fund Insurance Company

No institution in San Francisco has had a more remarkable career during the past three years than the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company. This company was "hard hit" by the fire; its home office was destroyed, its records burned, many of its stockholders were financially crippled—in short, the company was threatened with destruction even before its liability could be ascertained. How the company struggled under its burdens, settling its losses in full to the satisfaction of policyholders and how it reorganized and set about the recovery of the old position which it had held, are matters of financial history in San Francisco. Very few insurance companies paid out more cash than the Fireman's Fund. Policies to the value of eleven millions were settled in money and stock. As the result of its splendid achievement in rehabilitation the company is stronger now than ever before. It has emerged from a trying experience with its reputation untarnished and its excellent plant intact. Old customers have been glad to return to the company and the distinction gained by its sturdy fight against severe odds has brought business which had never been written by the company before. Today it is prosperous; it has a capital stock of $1,500,000 and its assets total $7,000,000. In the finances of this city the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company is a factor which cannot be overlooked.

Some thing that business men need the most and receive the least of, is, "relaxation in the form of systematic exercise and dry breathing."

A place for the imparting of this has been instituted by A. E. Van Doozer at 239 Geary street and a recent visitor was greatly surprised to find so many of San Francisco's best doctors, lawyers and bankers clad in gymnasium regalia, going through a system of stunts for their every muscle, under the supervision of their able instructor.

The visitor was then shown through other parts of his airy and spacious institution and found many others busy at handball, medicine ball and boxing. It was most interesting to see Mr. Van Doozer handle so many intelligent men and at the same time see to it that each one received all that he needed, yet did not overdo it.

The arrangement for bathing is unique in that it is so fixed that many who are in a hurry are able to receive their bath at the same time. Another very interesting department was the massage room. Here the masseurs were as busy as bees rubbing out sore spots.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There was a better tone to securities at the end of the week and excellent buying in some of the leading specialties. The rally was at least logical in view of the decline early in the week. Banking interests were instrumental in depressing values during the week's session in order to maintain a stable money rate over the end of the year. There is very little to say as to the coming security market except that leading bankers are expressing themselves as satisfied with the outlook and that higher prices will come after the first of the year. We feel conservatively bullish on the situation.

Grain—The market during the past week has been of a holiday character and prices have fluctuated within a narrow range. The principal factors in wheat have been the strong cash demand at all primary markets and the small receipts. The latter probably has been due to the present Switchmen's strike in the Northwest and excessive snow and rainfall throughout the middle West, making roads impassable. The foreign news on the whole has been more favorable, especially so from Argentine, and reports from there were inclined to modify the damage that last week's cables made so much of, and which gave us a good advance. Shipments last week from Argentine to the continent continued very light and Russian shipments have also fallen off, which leaves India and Australia and Canada to draw from until February, when Argentine wheat will be available. The growing crop could not be in better condition. Snow has fallen throughout the Winter Wheat Belt and the crop is generally covered, with only minor reports of damage where there was no covering. The market is in a position to respond either way as sentiment is very much mixed, but as long as cash commands such large premiums in all markets wheat can safely be bought on any drive made by the bears.

Cotton—The tone of the cotton market remains steady at the advance and there is more doing in spots in the South, and in cotton goods in the North. Southern spot markets are generally 1-16 to 1-8 higher and sales show signs of increasing as the result of more inquiry from American and foreign spinners. On the other hand there is more activity in the cotton goods markets of the North. According to reports from New York, jobbers and retailers are doing the best holiday business in years, 20 per cent better than last year and 40 per cent better than in 1907. The great West is reaping the benefits of very high prices for grain and provisions, hog products selling at the highest prices for 30 years. The South is sharing in the income of a good corn crop and has about disposed of its cotton crop at prices higher for this time of year than for about 35 years. In the industrial centers of New England and the North, labor is well employed with more pay, while capital is so well invested that regular dividends and extra dividends are being declared as a result of the flourishing conditions now in evidence throughout the country from the Mexican Gulf to the Canadian line and from the Pacific to the Atlantic Ocean. Therefore a full home consumption of cotton can be looked for. These conditions will place Europe in an awkward position as they have yet to obtain about 4,000,000 bales to complete their season's requirements of American cotton, a quantity of cotton impossible to secure for the reason that American mills, if they use as much cotton as last season, 5,060,000 bales, will need about 3,000,000 bales more, which, when added to Europe's requirements of about 4,000,000, means a want by the world of 7,000,000 bales during the balance of the season, while the amount yet to be marketed by the South is only about 3,550,000, plus about 1,500,000 at ports and thirty counted towns, making an available supply of only about 5,050,000, or about 2,000,000 less than needed. We are extremely bullish and expect much higher prices as the season advances and competition for the remnant of the crop becomes more and more pronounced.

Copper—To the student of averages the market approximately maintains a high level. If we look into it a little more closely, however, we see that this seemingly high average is principally due to advances in a few stocks. Christmas week is proverbally a quiet and often a weak period, but there was this year a better feeling and an underlying strength which in a great sense can be attributed to comparatively easy money, the prospect of a distribution for investment of more than $225,000,000 of dividends and interest on January 1. There are hardly any new developments in the general list of copper stocks excepting Inspiration and Cactus, upon which we have good news from a most reliable source. The steady but quiet advance in the prices of the same shows that there is some ground for the good reports. Our advices on Anaconda continue to be most bullish and this stock is unquestionably a good purchase at the present price and a good thing on any recession. Lake Copper also continues to show great strength, due no doubt to its good statements. The Ray Coppers and Miami show continued strength and are unquestionably a good purchase at or about the present prices. In fact the fundamental conditions of the copper market founded on the early prospect of higher spot copper, give us every assurance that the general copper list is a good purchase.

Local Securities—Barring some little activity in Spring Valley and Pacific Gas and Electric stocks, the local stock and bond market has been, for the past week or so, a very holiday affair. The former stock after being advanced several points and, to all appearances, looking as if it would continue strong, turned weaker suddenly and sold sharply off. Pacific Gas stocks have gained greatly in popularity and, on local and eastern buying orders, have increased in price. Associated Oil has been dull and rather neglected and has suffered some decline. Alaska Packers continues very strong, much of the floating stock that has been on the market being bought up. The balance of the stock list has been quiet with few changes. The principal bond trade has been in Spring Valley Water 4s, United Railroad 4s, Peoples Water 5s and Southern Pacific refunding 4s, though their prices have not, at the present writing, changed materially. It is said that Alaska Packers and Pacific Gas and Electric stocks will be the January features of the local stock market and that Associated Oil should be taken in on this decline.

The Yosemite in Winter or Summer

Let it go at that. Yosemite in Winter or Yosemite in Summer—no one will ever decide finally when this great valley looks most beautiful, but the man who is asked for his opinion will usually decide for the season in which he saw it last.

The opening of Yosemite all the year round has only been made possible during the last two seasons by the building of the Yosemite Valley railroad up the beautiful Merced Canyon and the erection of the handsome Hotel del Portal at El Portal, the terminus of the road, at the very gateway to the National Park. The result is that parties of eastern tourists as well as Californians are going into Yosemite every week. One party of one hundred people from San Francisco and around the bay are spending New Year's Day skating on Mirror Lake, climbing the trials, sleighing, tobogganing and traveling over the snow on snow shoes. These are sports which few of us who live in California are able to enjoy without going far afield, but a trip to Yosemite under present conditions is so easy and free from all discomfort that everyone who can spare a few days ought to take advantage of the opportunity to see this beautiful Sierra Garden in its winter dress.

HOTEL DEL PORTAL AT THE GATEWAY TO YOSEMITE

BRIDAL VEIL FALLS IN WINTER

Snow shoes, skates, sleds and sleighs can all be obtained in the valley.

It is an axiom among transportation people that you should always feed your passengers well. Mr. C. A. Babb, manager of Hotel del Portal, was for years with the Harvey Dining System and has taken the lesson to heart. All the guests who stay at Del Portal speak of the excellence of the service, the broad verandas, comfortable lounging room, the well furnished bedrooms and the fine dining hall. On a trip into the heart of the Sierras one would naturally not object very strongly if one had to "rough it" a little, but here the reverse is the case. Everything seems to have been foreseen, and at the end of a day's climbing to Chinquapin Falls one sits in front of the great log fire in the hotel satisfied in mind and body. The pleasant murmur of the rippling Merced lulls you to slumber and you wonder why it should ever be necessary to leave this beautiful spot in the Sierras.

STAGING THROUGH FAIRYLAND INTO YOSEMITE

The stage leaves Hotel del Portal every day and makes the trip into the heart of the Valley in a little over three hours. You can spend a few days in Yosemite or return the same night to Del Portal. There is no snow at El Portal, nor for seven miles up the canyon, and no additional wraps are required at El Portal, where it is warm and sunny. On the trip into Yosemite it is well to take an overcoat and rubbers, though both will be discarded when you join the merry throng of skaters and sled riders.

A Sorry Business

The mending of rifts within lutes, of manners, morals, health, ways that lead to destruction, and the like, is at best a sorry business; at worst, a matter of expediency. Many valuable thoroughbred musicians having been lost to the San Francisco Musical (?) Club through an ill-bred closing of doors given due notice in these columns a few weeks ago, there is now a movement in the other direction, towards a more open policy, as follows: "The following amendment to the Constitution of the San Francisco Musical Club is hereby presented in writing, as provided by Article X of the Constitution, to be voted upon at the regular meeting of the club, to be held on January 6, 1910. The first paragraph of Article VI of the Constitution is hereby amended so as to read as follows: Article VI; Membership: The club shall consist of Active, Associate and Honorary Members. No qualification for, or restrictions upon, persons entitled to membership shall be fixed except by this Constitution." This amending of its constitution by the S. F. Musical is a healthy sign, indictative of a knowledge on its part of what is good for that which ails it. A so-called musical society in New York by an action identical to that of the San Francisco Musical so-called, fairly clubbed itself to death. Death-bed repentances of such as have ears to hear—ears ridiculously long—make sorry music, save in the judgment of the listening recording angel. The moral is beautiful!

Tantalus Scores Again

This paper some time ago commented on the devotion of young "Billy" Burke to handsome Genevieve Walker and predicted the announcement of their engagement. On Tuesday the prediction was fulfilled. Two years ago when Miss Walker visited her grandmother there were rumors of her engagement to another well known bachelor who was conspicuously devoted and seemed favored by Mrs. Martin. But the fascinating Philadelphia girl returned to her home and although the persistent suitor journeyed East to see her there was no betrothal. Instead Miss Walker announced her intention of becoming a trained nurse and made all her plans to enter a Philadelphia hospital training school. It took much of Mrs. Martin's well known diplomacy in bringing members of her family to her point of view, to persuade Miss Genevieve out of the idea. Miss Walker is the daughter of Mrs. Genevieve Walker of Philadelphia who is a stepdaughter of Mrs. Eleanor Martin. William Burke who is a son of Richard Burke has lived in Ireland until recently, but after their marriage in June the young people will make their home here.

MRS. FRANK NORRIS

With her daughter "Billy." The charming widow of California's great novelist has announced her engagement to Mr. Frank Preston.

Fritzi Scheff and Hubby in Costume

Little Fritzi Scheff does not believe in the exclusiveness which shuts some stars in their rooms in solitary grandeur. The shopping public, during the past week, has had many a chance to rub elbows with the dainty comedienne and quite frequently business was interrupted while buyers and sellers watched the petite prima donna make her way through the shops. One cloudy cold afternoon Fritzi caused a commotion in Geary street. The populace gaped in open-mouthed admiration as she tripped along beside her husband, John Fox Jr. A more contrasted pair it would tax one's imagination to picture. She was clad in snowy white from head to foot, wearing a tailor-made dress of serge with a short kilted skirt and box coat, the skirt terminating above boots of immaculate whiteness with heels of the height in vogue during the days of Louis XV. She hopped along with short staccato steps, like a bird, while Fox, clad in rough tweed knickerbockers, with walking shoes of the pattern favored by champion Weston, his spindle calves in grotesque contrast with the baggy knickies, loped by her side, his shoulders hunched in grim determination to get there or die. Fox is of the extreme mental type, bulgy-eyed, bulgy-browed, with an enormous head on narrow shoulders. Apparently he disdains all frivolity and lightness. Fritzi, however, evens up matters; for nothing is beneath her notice.

The MacMahon-Borel Surprise

The Borel Family Colony was increased this week by another cottage which in the future will be the home of Mr. and Mrs. Antoine Borel Jr., whose wedding on Wednesday noon was one of the holiday surprises which little Dan Cupid has had tucked away in his quiver for a long time. There have been many pretty little brides, but little Madie MacMahon looked as daintily bewitching as the prettiest of them, and the two made such a handsome couple that everyone remarked about it. Young Borel, who is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Antoine Borel, has been looked upon by ambitious mamas as one of the most desirable chaps for the role of son-in-law. Wealthy, fastidiously educated, traveled and experienced, with friends in the best society of Vienna, Paris, London and Berlin, many hoped he would choose one of the popular belles. Instead of this his choice was a winsome pretty little convent girl whom he met a few days after she had said her good-byes to the sisters of the Notre Dame Convent in San Jose. Madie MacMahon is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Augustus MacMahon and a granddaughter of Bernard MacMahon, one of the pioneer builders of San Francisco. One of the prettiest luncheons of the week was Miss MacMahon's when she entertained the five Borel girls, Miss Borel, Miss Lupita Borel, Mrs. Aylett Cotton Jr., Mrs. John Lewis and Mrs. Louis Bovet, and the debutantes of the winter.

The Borel Estate

The Borel family owns one of the largest and most beautiful of the country estates about San Mateo, and as soon as the children marry they are presented with a handsomely furnished home on the estate. The last cottage, built near the old home, is as cosy and pretty as can be. Besides this home the Borels own one of the show places in Switzerland, a genuine old castle, built in feudal style, with moat and drawbridge, and here the family visits annually. Neither young Borel nor his pretty bride cares much for society, both being fond of art and music. In fact Antoine Borel owns one of the finest collections of old books and handsomely bound volumes hereabouts. The wedding took place at the MacMahon home on Pine and Jones street, the Rev. Father Malloy performing the ceremony. All of the Borel family was there and a pretty array they made, stately Mrs. Borel in gray silk with an overdress of rose point lace, while Miss Borel who was the only girl attendant, wore a pearl-embroidered green chiffon over white satin. The pretty little bride wore a girlish looking white satin, all embroidered in seed pearls.

The Norris-Preston Engagement

Society received a genuine surprise during the week when the announcement of the engagement of Mrs. Frank Norris and Frank Preston was made. Some of their friends were inclined to question the truth of the story, but when the young man himself called up a prominent society girl and asked her for her congratulations, there was no longer any room for doubt. Mrs. Norris was Miss Nettie Black before her marriage to the late Frank Norris. She has a daughter about eight years of age. Mrs. Norris is a few years Mr. Preston's senior. She derives a comfortable income from her late husband's plays and books and has made her home in Santa Barbara for some time. Frank Preston is the son of the late Colonel E. F. Preston, the well known attorney, by his second wife who was a Miss Baldwin, sister of O. D. Baldwin. Mrs. Preston returned from Europe a few days before Christmas and was greatly surprised to hear of her son's engagement, but expressed herself as well pleased with the match. Mrs. Willard Drown and Mrs. Worthington Ames, the well known and attractive matrons, are Frank Preston's sisters. They were formerly Edith and Norma Preston and were very popular belles in their debutante days.

Love at First Sight

While Frank Preston is rather too young to be called a "confirmed bachelor," whatever that may be, he is one who has seemed singularly impervious to feminine charm. He makes his home at the University Club and is present at most of the important dancing events of society. Mrs. Norris, also, appeared to have no wish to marry again. She has had scores of suitors but none more favored than another. After her husband's death, which followed an operation for appendecitis in this city seven years ago, Mrs. Norris made her home for a time with the novelist's mother. Later she took up her residence with Mrs. Isobel Strong, daughter of Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson, and for the past two years the two friends have lived together in Santa Barbara near the Stevenson home. It was there she met Mr. Preston who spent several weeks in Santa Barbara last summer. The interest was immediate and mutual, constituting a case of "love at first sight." Miss Black, daughter of a music teacher, was only seventeen when she became betrothed to Frank Norris, then a recent graduate of the University of California, with fame yet to be won. Their courtship has been described in "Blix" in the heroine of which Norris drew a striking portrait of his wife. Mrs. Norris who is now in Santa Barbara has written to friends here telling of her engagement.

The Death of Mrs. Robinson

There were circumstances of unusual sadness surrounding the death in Philadelphia of Mrs. Edward Moore Robinson, formerly Aileen Ivers of this city. Chief among these is the fact that her husband was himself lying at the point of death from pneumonia. Both realized their serious condition some weeks ago and made provision for the future care of their boys who are fourteen and six years of age. Mr. Robinson's two sisters are married to millionaires, but have no children; so it was agreed before Mrs. Robinson's death that in the event of her husband following her, the boys would be reared by their aunts. Mrs. William Irwin and her daughter Helen left the city last Sunday morning to attend the funeral of Mrs. Robinson in Philadelphia.

King Edward's Tribute

Although Mrs. Edward Moore Robinson's death was not unexpected, it was believed possible that she would survive for several months. Her mother, Mrs. Richard Ivers, and her sister, Mrs. William Irwin who with Miss Helen Irwin have been constantly with her in the past months had been so encouraged by her improvement that they journeyed to San Francisco to spend the holiday weeks planning to return to Philadelphia in January. A telegram calling them East was received on Sunday and a second dispatch announcing Mrs. Robinson's death came soon after their departure. It is stated that the remains of Mrs. Robinson may be brought to this city for interment. Julian Story's famous portrait of this lovely Californian who was once called by King Edward "the most beautiful American woman in London" has been remarked for its striking resemblance to the artist's wife, Emma Eames.

The Mintzer Dance

One of the most brilliant dances of the holiday season took place on Tuesday evening, December 28, at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. William Mintzer in Pacific avenue. It was given in honor of the Misses Mintzer who are here on vacation from school in the East. Few homes in this city are better adapted for entertaining than the Mintzer mansion. Mrs. Mintzer was formerly Miss Tewxberry, daughter of the late Dr. Tewxberry who left immense holdings at San Pablo which of late years have brought great wealth to Mrs. Tewxberry. Mrs. Mintzer was the widow of Dr. Ware of the navy when she married William Mintzer, an attorney of Philadelphia. She had an only daughter by Dr. Ware, Miss Genevieve Ware, who surprised her mother and grandmother one day by informing them that at such a day and such an hour, if they went to Grace Church, they would see her married. All efforts to dissuade her from her choice failed. She married a poor young English farmer and now has several children. She seems to be very happy in her simple country life, seeing little of society. The Mintzers on the other hand live in regal style with a retinue of servants. Mr. and Mrs. Mintzer met many years ago in Philadelphia. Mr. Mintzer was then a struggling young lawyer. It is only within the last few years all this vast amount of wealth has come to Mrs. Tewxberry. Mr. Mintzer, I'm told, has proved an able manager for his mother-in-law, who is lavish in the extreme with her family. Mrs. Tewxberry is a fine looking lady and at the smart functions she looks the grande dame to perfection. Mr. Mintzer is a musician of note while Mrs. Mintzer has a cultivated voice, her husband always accompanying her on the piano.

Lady Granard to be a Catholic

The very latest news about the granddaughter of D. O. Mills who is the wife of Lord Granard runs to the effect that she is taking instructions in the Catholic faith and will soon be received into the church. Lord Granard belongs to an old Catholic family and it is likely that Lady Granard has been placed in contact with many of England's most learned ecclesiastics since her marriage; hence it is not surprising that she should contemplate a change of faith. The Granards are now in retirement at Castle Forbes near Longford in Ireland, the family seat, and will remain there until after New Year's. Lord Granard is already laying his plans to capture the brilliant position of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland under the new administration. He has put forward his brother, Captain Donald Forbes, to contest the Tory constituency of Marylebone and it is estimated that the fight will cost $10,000. Meanwhile the Granards are preparing for social triumphs in London. They will occupy Mortimer House, one of the largest mansions in Belgravia, as soon as it has been transformed to suit their taste. A new wing is being added and the garden on Grosvenor Crescent is being enlarged. The ironwork gates which cost Mrs. Whitelaw Reid well over five figures will be put up as the entrance from Halkin street.

Christmas at Byron Springs

The guests at Byron Hot Springs spent a very enjoyable Christmas. The hotel was unusually crowded and the holiday throng indulged in all the forms of merry-making and good cheer which are characteristic of the happy festival. In a great measure it was a children's Christmas, though as a matter of fact the grown-ups romped and sang and played games with almost as much zest as the young folks. In the evening the children from the neighborhood sang around the Christmas tree and received remembrances, as did the guests. There was one incident of the day which made a deep impression on all. Mrs. Vincent Cook of Portland who is a frequent guest at Byron Hot Springs, sent a number of toys for the children, with a special request that they be given to some little tots whom she had seen at the school near the hotel. This thoughtfulness touched a sympathetic chord in the breasts of everybody and it would be hard to say whether

A Player and a Play for the Old

By Edward F. O'Day

It seemed to me that "The Music Master" as played by David Warfield was distinctively a play for the old. Not that the youngsters cannot enjoy it; of course they find a keen pleasure in every moment of it and that irrespective of their dry-eyed or weeping condition. But there is so much more in "The Music Master" as played by David Warfield than mere stuff for enjoyment, that I think it transcends the appreciation of those who are youthful in years or experience. I would not speak so of the Klein comedy were it presented with any other American actor in the title role. Warfield stands alone on the American stage, perhaps on the English-speaking stage, and it is so much a truism to say that he has put into "The Music Master" more than he has taken out of it and that he has put into it more than its author and David Belasco put into it, that no emphasis need be placed on that phase of the matter here. Try to imagine a younger man of Warfield's genius attempting the part of Herr von Barwig and you will readily grasp what I mean when I say that the drama is to be properly appreciated only by the old. A younger Warfield could not play the part. David Warfield without the heavy and significant lines in his face which you may study in any photograph would not be the David Warfield who sways the emotions in "The Music Master." There are pangs in this play, bitter pangs and how can the young who have never known pangs, rise to the understanding of them? One must have suffered, as no doubt Warfield has suffered, to have a heart perfectly attuned to sympathy for the music master's exquisite suffering. One must have groped his way in silent loneliness through the desolate darkness of the valley of shadows, a terrible journey which all make at least once and some many times, before the poignancy of such grief as that simulated by Warfield strikes home to the soul. Youth has its sorrows which are generally disappointments. They abide long with some and not so long with others, their duration being a matter not so much of heart as of temperament. For some they are a luxury to be wrapped round the soul like a comfortable cloak; for others an ache that recurs again and again, but bearable because youth is exuberant and its spirit elastic. One day these youthful sorrows rise out of the breast and wing away and then it is seen by youth, as by wiser heads, that they were really but disappointments, the yearning for that which was desirable and very good to have but by no means indispensable. It is part of youth's education to learn that youthful sorrows leave no cicatrice on the heart, a humiliating thing for youth to acknowledge but none the less a wise dispensation of a providence which does not tempt man more than he is able. It is all so different with the old. As life lengthens its meaning deepens and broadens; awful problems present themselves for solution and may not be evaded. Then the soul begins to take the impress of its struggles; the face too carries the story in deepening lines; "the eyes are a little weary." Is it not so with all who have raised children? and with those others whose backs are curved to the weight of crosses which should be borne, not by them, but by their brethren? All the old are victims of life, personal or vicarious victims, and all the old will tell you, if they give you their sacred confidence, that the meaning of life is sorrow. That is the meaning of life for all who properly appreciate "The Music Master"; that is the meaning of life for David Warfield; that is the reason why youth cannot properly appreciate either. Seemings, not meanings, are for youth. "Stern reality" is a phrase to them but how it must sear the soul of Herr von Barwig. Warfield, you may say, is not a very old man. That is not so if you count his years by the calendar of which I have been speaking. The years of which I make mention are not all years of 365 days; they can be remarkably short and still drag their weight of time across the soul. Let us not insist too much on the dates in the family Bible nor think of youth as a matter of birthdays merely and you and I who need not plead guilty to gray hairs may flatter ourselves that we are among the company of the elect of life who properly appreciate David Warfield in "The Music Master."

Opening of the New Columbia

On Monday night, January 10, Gottlob, Marx and company will open the doors of the new Columbia Theatre which has been in course of construction for the past year at the corner of Geary and Mason streets. The new theatre is one of the finest houses of amusement in the United States and is as perfect as modern structural art can make it. The theatre investment represents an outlay of $850,000. The building is of steel and reinforced concrete. Every possible comfort both for audience and player has been sought out and made the most of in the construction and when William H. Crane appears as the opening attraction on Monday night, January 10, he will have the honor of dedicating the finest playhouse San Francisco has ever known. The Frohman star is to present George Ade's comedy, "Father and the Boys," and will be surrounded by his New York company including Margaret Dale, Louis Massen, Mildred Beverly, Elsa Payne, Vivian Martin, Forrest Orr, Percy Brooke, Arthur Holman and others. The auction sale of seats for the opening night will be held on Tuesday afternoon, January 4, at 1:30 p. m. in the ball room of the St. Francis Hotel. The proceeds of the sale will be donated to local charities. The regular advance sale of seats for the engagement opens Thursday morning at the box office of the theatre.

"The Alaskan" at the Savoy

Ezra Kendall and his company of players will make their last appearances at the Savoy in "The Vinegar Buyer" this Saturday afternoon and evening, and commencing with a special matinee Sunday, with the usual matinees on Thursday and Saturday, the new "Alaskan," fresh from the triumph of a five months' run in Chicago, will begin an engagement limited to one week. Since "The Alaskan" was presented in San Francisco it has passed into the hands of Richard F. Carroll and Gus Weinburg, eminent comic opera comedians who were commissioned to freshen the book, swell the comedy parts and give the show more "speed." Richard Carroll, well remembered as a brilliant comedian here during the palmy days of Fischer's Theatre, plays a theatrical manager with a troupe on his hands and Mr. Weinburg portrays a German naturalist in charge of a wealthy niece, on an exploration tour of Alaska. The other characters are assumed by capable players.

"St. Elmo" at the Alcazar

"St. Elmo," the reigning dramatic sensation in the East, will be given its first presentation west of Chicago next Monday evening and throughout the week at the Alcazar. It was adapted by Williard Holcomb from Augusta J. Evans-Wilson's famous story, and is the only version authorized by the gifted novelist, who has successfully enjoined about half-a-dozen piracies in as many different cities. Vaughan Glaser, Fay Courteney and a selected company are now playing in it to crowded houses in the Academy of Music, New York, and all the metropolitan critics have declared that nothing quite so thrilling has been staged there in many years. In the cast will be the best of the Alcazar company, with Evelyn Vaughan as Edna and John Ince as St. Elmo. That the play will exceed the Alcazar's usual one-week run is the opinion of all who have read the manuscript or witnessed a rehearsal.

The Lauder is Coming

It is seldom that an artist of world-wide reputation visits this country without being seen outside of New York, but Harry Lauder, Scotland's idol and undoubtedly the world's most successful comedian, is the exception and played nine weeks last season without leaving the metropolis. This year he was brought back by William Morris, Inc., with the prospect of playing only in New York, with the exception of a single week at the Morris houses in Boston and Chicago. Later a hurried tour of the principal cities from Toronto to the Pacific Coast was decided upon and four weeks were set aside, one of which is for San Francisco. This will commence Monday night, January 10, with performances every afternoon and evening thereafter, including Saturday. January 15. Dreamland Rink, in Steiner street near Sutter has been secured and will be transformed into a comfortable auditorium. Lauder heads a company of American and European artists including Julian Eltinge. A special orchestra is under the baton of Lauder's personal director, Mr. Charles Frank. On account of the size of Dreamland the scale of prices has been arranged to fit all purses, ranging from fifty cents to two dollars for reserved seats and the sale will open Monday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co's, Sutter and Kearny streets.

FRANCES SLOSSON

The charming young comedienne who will appear next week at the Orpheum

Olga Nethersole Coming

The second and final week of David Warfield's engagement at the Van Ness will commence with the performance of "The Music Master" on Monday night, January 3. Warfield's present engagement is amply illustrative of the great hold that the Belasco star has upon theatregoers, for, after having played the Klein drama in this city last season for four weeks, he returns to receive another fine welcome. On Monday night, January 10, Olga Nethersole will appear at the Van Ness Theatre in her latest success, "The Writing on the Wall," by William J. Hurlbut, a young American playwright. "The Writing on the Wall" deals with society life in New York and presents a question that is of the utmost importance, that of tenement reform. Miss Nethersole assumes a character that is radically different from any of her many former successful roles; she essays the part of a young matron of New York's smart set, whose sole purpose in life is the welfare of her child and the betterment of her fellowmen. She is supported by an exceptionally strong cast.

Another Good Bill at the Orpheum

The great success achieved by the dainty singing comedienne, Alice Lloyd, at the Orpheum, is almost without parallel here and the announcement that her engagement cannot be prolonged beyond next week will be received with general regret. The program for the coming week, while retaining Miss Lloyd for its chief feature, will nevertheless contain a number of novel acts. Franklyn Underwood and Frances Slosson will present the comedietta "Dobbs' Dilemma." The Basque Grand Opera Quartette, French vocalists, will render numbers from "Il Trovatore," "Martha" and other operas. Belle Davis comes again with her pickanninies. Fox and Foxie's Circus introduce trained dogs, cats and Foxie, the smallest horse in the world. The Klein Family will return for next week only. It will be the last week of the Permane Brothers and also of the English eccentrics, The McNaughtons.

The Sembrich Concerts

The dates for the Sembrich concerts at the Garrick are Sunday afternoon, January 9, Thursday night, January 13, and Sunday afternoon, January 16. The star will be assisted by Francis Rogers, baritone, and Frank La Forge, pianist. At each concert Mme. Sembrich will sing some of her greatest stage successes. Standard songs by the great French, German and English composers and works by Americans are also on her list of offerings. A special feature will be the great duets that she will sing with Mr. Rogers. Complete programs for the first two concerts may be had at the box office which opens Monday morning, January 3, at Sherman Clay & Co's.

"Texas" Comes to Ye Liberty

The Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, follow their production this week of "The Admirable Crichton" with "Texas," a piece that is brand new to stock audiences of the West. In fact their presentation of the play will mark the first time it has been given by any but a traveling company, which means that it has never before been offered at popular prices. "Texas" has been one of the standard successes on tour for the past five seasons. It is a true picture of Western ranch life, with scenes laid in the State from which its name is derived, and tells an interesting and oftentimes thrilling story of frontier life. In the original production given of the play in New York City, Sydney Ayres, the leading man of the Bishop players, was starred in the leading role and continued to play there for an entire season and for another season in the larger Eastern cities. He appears in the same character at Ye Liberty next week, and in addition is giving the production the benefit of the knowledge gained by his long season in the play. All of the favorites of the company will be found in congenial roles, and the usual careful scenic surroundings will be provided. After one week of "Texas" the company will offer "My Wife," in which the new leading lady, Blanche Hall, will make her first Oakland appearance.

The Greenbaum Sunday "Pop" Concerts

Manager Will Greenbaum who was the originator of Sunday ensemble music concerts in this city, announces the new Lyric String Quartette in a course of four concerts to be given monthly, commencing Sunday afternoon, January 30. The quartette this season is composed of four young women. For smooth, even and well balanced ensemble Mr. Greenbaum claims that this is the best quartette he has yet presented. Season tickets for the course of four concerts are $1.00 and $2.00 which is as low as in the big music study centers of Europe. They may be secured at Mr. Greenbaum's office at 101 Post street, either by mail or personal application. The quartette consists of Mary Pasmore and Sally Ehramn, violins, Viola Furth, viola, and Dorothy Pasmore, 'cello.

Nance O'Neil's New Play

The Belasco press agent has announced that "The Lily," the new play in which Nance O'Neil triumphed recently, receiving twenty-seven curtain calls after the third act, is "perhaps the most bold, daring and effective drama ever produced on the stage of this country." Due allowance must always be made for the exaggeration of the press agent. Meager accounts of "The Lily" indicate that it deals with a theme as old as the sixth commandment. The story, a Belasco adaptation from the French of Pierre Wolff and Gaston Leroux, appears to be a plea for free love. The younger daughter of a profligate old French nobleman has become the mistress of a married man who is unable to procure a divorce from his wife. When the truth is revealed she confesses the fact and pleads full justification. Thereupon her father, in a fury of passion, would drive her out of his home, when the elder sister, a paragon of self-denial and virtue, who has been condemned to a life of celibacy, comes to her support, declaring that she had a right to obey the instincts of human affection and that anything is better than a loveless and stunted life. From past performances it may be surmised that Belasco, with the aid of the French playwrights, has so weighted this theme with sentimental claptrap that the ordinary silly playgoer is perfectly prepared to accept the conclusion to which the drama is carried.

Correct Usage at Weddings

Unless specifically requested to do otherwise the bridegroom's attendants wear the same style of clothes as he does. Occasionally the attendants wear cravats and gloves of some delicate tint. Those of the bridegroom are always pearl grey or white for a day affair, and white only in the evening.

Frequently it is the expressed wish of the bride and bridegroom to have the occasion informal. Unless such a desire is a matter of personal request the attendants should follow the formal scheme. While there is nothing to substitute for the frock coat or the black cutaway for a day ceremony—the sack suit being wholly devoid of dignity— one could substitute the frock coat of the black cutaway for the swallowtail in the evening, though strictly they are for day wear only. If that is done the accessories are the same as for these clothes. Sometimes circumstances make it necessary for the bridegroom to wear the sack suit. One cannot then prescribe any "correct" accessories because the main garment is inappropriate. With considerations of proper form thus eliminated, however, good taste would suggest that the jacket and trousers be plain black, the waistcoat white, the collar a wing shape, the cravat a grey or black and white four-in-hand, the shirt white, plain or pleated, the gloves grey, and the shoes patent leather.

It is customary for the bridegroom to give his attendants their cravats and gloves. These are forwarded to their homes, together with the bridegroom's gift of cuff-links, or cravat pin, or they are presented at a farewell bachelor dinner given by the bridgegroom a week or a fortnight before the wedding.

For the ceremony the attendants leave their hats in the dressing-room—or in the vestibule of the church—and the best man looks after the hat and gloves of the bridegroom.

The expenses borne by the bridegroom are the clergyman's fee, the tip to the sexton if the church is opened for rehearsal, the wedding ring, the bride's and bridemaids' bouquets, the carriages for the ushers, the carriage for himself and the best man to go to the ceremony, and the carriage in which he and the bride depart. The bridegroom, too, entertains the best man at breakfast or luncheon, which ever immediately precedes the ceremony.

In the Limelight

A brilliant gathering will be on hand in the Ball Room of the St. Francis Hotel next Tuesday afternoon when the auction sale of seats for the opening night of the New Columbia will take place. As the proceeds are to be donated to charity there will be very lively bidding for the choice reservations.

Among the first attractions to appear at the new Columbia Theatre are William H. Crane in "Father and the Boys"; Marie Cahill in "The Boys and Betty"; Robert Mantell in a repertoire of eleven plays; "The Round Up" and The Lambardi Grand Opera Company.

Charlotte Tittell is one of the members of the company appearing in support of Olga Nethersole. She is one of the well known Tittell sisters who are San Franciscans.

Mme. Ester Adaberto is the dramatic soprano this season with the Lambardi Grand Opera Company coming to the new Columbia Theatre.

Mrs. Leslie Carter is to play an engagement at the Van Ness Theatre a few weeks hence.

For Miss Florence Roberts' tour of the Pacific Coast cities the Shuberts have decided on but two plays for her repertoire. They will be "The Transformation," a four act drama, and "Gloria," a three act Florentine comedy.

canvas tent and the luxury of housekeeping in such conditions would make a story of itself.

All through the month of May the bees worked with proverbial industry. We expected a dearth of bee food about the middle of the month, but the little workers lighted upon some uncounted source of honey supply. I found thousands at work on the yellow blossoms of the willows that lined the irrigation ditches. The rancher's first crop of alfalfa was in stack by May 26 and the bees had not interferred in any way with the farm work.

A day or two after this the bee lady and I hived a swarm. It was a hot day just after noon hour when I spied the swarm circling overhead, whirling and gyrating and filling the air with the shrill insistent swarming note that has since become so familiar.

The bee man was a mile away in the hayfield; I called to his wife and the two of us started in pursuit of the swarm. It alighted in a pile of tree prunings. We brought an empty hive, and the cluster, nearly two feet long, a compact bunch of crawling bees, was brushed into the hive.

One of the small boys of the ranch arrived during the excitement. We despatched him for a sheet, which we spread over the hive, weighting the corners with tin cans filled with earth; there are no convenient rocks in this part of the San Joaquin. The bee man commended our ability in hiving the swarm and laughed of course at the eternal feminine displayed by the means we had taken to secure it.

"Why didn't you take a spoon and beat on a tin pan? That would have started the laggards in all right," he said.

One gratifying point to remember about swarming bees is that they rarely sting. That night we added hive 51 to my section of the apiary. During the season we hived twelve swarms. These were divided between the bee lady and the amateur and we ran them ourselves for the small frames of comb honey. We lost several swarms owing to the wide canal over which they took a beeline and made for the oak woods of the Rancho Laguna de Tache.

The honey flow was so good that new supers were added. These are extra stories that permit of more combs being placed for the workers to fill.

We extracted the honey for the first time the third week in June and about every three weeks afterward for two months. This operation varies of course. It depends upon the wealth of blossom that controls the honey flow, and this is governed by weather conditions.

When the filled combs were sealed or nearly so they were placed in the extractor. This is a tin cylinder the size of a large cask. It has a series of revolving cases into which the comb frames were slipped, and they are unsealed by a sharp knife shaped for the purpose.

The extractor crank is turned rapidly. Centrifugal force throws out the honey and leaves the combs intact, to be again placed in the hives.

Turning the extractor is the only physically hard work that I have encountered in the pleasant occupation of keeping bees. You need a well developed masculine biceps to keep on hour after hour with this work. The bee lady and I spelled her husband, and we were a weary pair when the day was over.

The honey was stored in a huge tin tank, skimmed until perfectly clear, then packed into large square tins, ready for the Chicago market. The various extracting days rapidly increased our store, and the final day gave us a season's total of 10,000 pounds, five tons of clear golden honey. This was sold at five cents a pound. My share of the receipts:

5,000 pounds at five cents	$250.00
Comb honey, six hives	18.00
Total	$268.00

My share of the expenses:

To fifty cans	$11.00
Six hives and combs	17.00
Tank	10.00
Extractor	17.50
Total	$55.50

The shining hours had been improved for my benefit:

By balance	$212.50

Apart from the engrossing dollars and cents part of my bee venture, there was always the free out of door life and the abiding interest in the comings, goings and doings of bee city.

The kind of bees in the apiary makes a world of difference to the beginner. Our apiary is composed of yellow banded Italians, with a few colonies of the light golden Italians. These are prime favorites with San Joaquin bee keepers.

No message to the bee lover is complete without a word as to enemies.

In the East the bee keeper contends with cold and wet. In the San Joaquin Valley we have to fight the fierce heat of an almost tropical summer. The melting of the comb is an apiary calamity, for not only are honey and wax wasted but the bees are invariably drowned in the sticky mess.

Joaquin, spiders and toads are active enemies of the bee. Toads hop up gaily from the irrigation ditches, station themselves in front of the hives and begin a gurgling call. The bees rush out ready for war and are instantly snapped down.

Robber bees are exasperating enemies to the apiarist. Robbing can be guarded against by leaving plenty of honey for winter stores and by reducing the hive entrance to an inch width.

Circumstances have much to do with bee honesty. A strong colony that has been cut short in its winter supply is easily tempted to appropriate the honey stores of its weaker neighbor. They go out in a body, overpower and kill the weaker colony and carry off the honey.

During November I noticed our bees busy on watermelons and canteloupes that the rancher had not thought worth gathering. We had heavy rain on November 25 and after that I saw comparatively few flying.

In December the days were foggy, with winter rains, and there were no bees in sight, but a week of warmth and sunshine in January started the working instinct, and many were tempted outside. They went back again until the permanent encouragement of blossoming almond and cotton wood brought them out for business.

Bee keeping is a delightful occupation for women, and out of doors work that is not too heavy for their strength. There is about one month's hard physical work all told in the San Joaquin bee keeper's year. Opening up the hives and extracting the honey is tiring, but not much more so than a strenuous day at golf.

There are many large apiaries in the San Joaquin Valley that are owned and managed by women. It is a great advantage to the beginner to follow a practical apiarist in the daily work around the hives. Theory is all very well, but conditions vary with location, and what you see and do yourself under direction is remembered.

My apiary has trebled, my knowledge and love of the work increased and with renewed health, a growing bank account and the schoolhouse five miles away life is abundantly worth living.

and Diana. It is preposterous, but it shows how far English Chesterton is carried when he tries to explain Shaw the Irishman.

I do not think that Chesterton the Catholic makes out a better case when he deals with Shaw the Puritan. To prove that Shaw is a Puritan Chesterton tells us that he is never frivolous, that he never gives his opinions a holiday. Of course this is nonsense and Chesterton contradicts this statement just as soon as he has used it to make good his difficult argument about Puritanism. I am not presuming to teach Chesterton how to argue, but let me suggest something. Suppose we say that a boy blows his nose because he has a cold in his head. That is a simple statement of a distressing situation, distressing alike to the boy and to those who are forced to be in his company. But is it the whole truth? No, it is not. It is only an inconsiderable and unimportant part of the truth. Certainly a boy blows his nose because he has a cold in his head, but why has he a cold in his head? A good family doctor will tell you, because he blows his nose, and will explain that blowing the nose irritates the membrances of the nose and makes one extremely liable to a cold in the head. It is plain therefore that as likely as not, the boy has a cold in his head because he has been blowing his nose. If Chesterton had applied this simple form of argumentation to Shaw he would have been impelled to say, not that Shaw must be a Puritan because he is never frivolous—a statement ridiculous and untrue—but that Shaw is so frequently frivolous because he is a Puritan—a statement which is borne out by Chesterton's own assertions. If there is anybody who has to be frivolous once in a while it is the Puritan; nature would not stand for Puritan severity uninterrupted by frivolity. As I have said, this is borne out by Chesterton's own assertions. He tells us that Shaw's father was a teetotaller who sometimes got drunk. There you have the perfect type of the Puritan. Shaw is not the perfect type like his father; it would be unusual for one family to produce two. Shaw is the modified type. He is a very serious dramatist who sometimes cuts a caper. For the sake of Shaw's father's soul I hope the old gentleman did not get drunk as often as his son cuts a caper. Shaw is frequently frivolous, he is continually giving his opinions a holiday. Shaw may be a puritan, but Catholic Chesterton has started out the wrong way to prove it.

I am not going to test Chesterton's estimate of Shaw any further, but I must call attention to one glaring error in the book. Chesterton says that the turning point in Shaw's dramatic career was reached with the publication of Man and Superman. I am compelled to disagree. When Shaw wrote Man and Superman his dramatic career was finished. Man and Superman is not a drama any more than The Revolutionists' Handbook which is annexed to it is a romance. Man and Superman is a tract, the most interesting tract ever written, but none the less a tract. Nobody ever thought of calling one of Landor's Imaginary Conversations a drama and Man and Superman is an imaginary conversation between Schopenauer and Nietzsche with Shaw continually "butting it."

In conclusion I cannot help remarking that Chesterton's book on Shaw reminds me irresistibly of the reason a friend of mine gave for not going to Mass on Sunday. My friend said that the affected way in which the young ladies walked up the aisle disgusted him. That is not a good reason for not going to Mass on Sunday; no theologian would accept it for a moment. But it is a very picturesque reason—not to a parish priest, perhaps, but to a lay person like myself. The reasons which Chesterton gives for Bernard Shaw are like that. They do not satisfy, but they are entertaining. One may go to Mass every Sunday and still smile at my friend's disgust. One may dislike Bernard Shaw and still enjoy Chesterton's book.

Dr. H. B. McIntyre of the Presidio has purchased a Stevens-Duryea Runabout.

Mrs. M. J. O'Connor has purchased her second Woods Electric which she presented to her daughter for Christmas.

Fred. E. Sanders recently had his car equipped with Diamond Demountable Rims and writes that he certainly would never operate a car again without this type of rim.

N. Cowan who has been with Hughson & Merton Co. for several years and who recently received an attractive offer from the Stewart Speedometer Company, has decided to remain in his present position with Hughson & Merton.

Morris Kind of the Santa Cruz-Portland Cement Company has just had the big Jinricksha wheels of his Oldsmobile equipped with the new Diamond Grip Tires.

The Pioneer Automobile Company report the sale and delivery through S. M. Phillips, their agent at Sacramento, of a Hudson car to D. M. Combs of Sacramento, the delivery of a Chalmers-Detroit seven passenger to P. C. Drescher of Mebius & Drescher Company and a Chalmers-Detroit "thirty" five passenger touring car to Dr. E. H. Buffum of Fair Oaks, Sacramento County.

S. F. Weaver is a strong advocate of the new Diamond Grip Tires. He states that he is still running on the original four which equipped his car and which has covered to date over 5,000 miles. The two front tires never even so much as suffered a puncture during that mileage.

W. C. Hood, Coast Representative of the Chalmers-Detroit Motor Company, has just returned after an extended southern trip covering Los Angeles, San Diego, Riverside, Pasadena and Redlands.

A. B. Costigan of the Pacific Motor Car Company has left for the East where he will visit his factory and also look over cars at the New York Show.

The young baseball artists who call themselves the "Buicks" are upholding the honor and dignity of their name. They lately achieved the ignominious defeat of the "Loziers" by a score of 14 to 4. Batteries for "Buicks" were Bishop and Gabriel. The feature of the game is said to have been the fielding of the "Buicks."

Harry H. Scott, treasurer of the Pacific Manifold Company, is one of the most ardent Hudson enthusiasts in the field. His firm have been equipping their country salesmen with Hudson Runabouts, to cover the valley and mountain territory. These machines are proving most successful and economcial in their work.

The Chalmers-Detroit "thirty" used on the stage at the Alcazar recently has claimed a great deal of attention, and a number of people have 'phoned the Pioneer Automobile Company regarding it. One lady 'phoned that it is the most beautiful runabout that she has ever seen, especially in lines and color. The machine was handled on the stage by Charles O'Day, and while the space is small the car responds so readily that one would think that he was coming on at the rate of twenty-five or thirty miles an hour. The car was chosen on account of its easy handling.

Messrs. Rogers & Stone have purchased a six-cylinder Stevens-Duryea car.

The Chalmers-Detroit Motor Company of Detroit, Michigan, have just wired their Pacific Coast Representative, W. C. Hood, to make arrangements to visit all the eastern automobile shows, and are sending Mr. Jean Bemb (winner of the Detroit trophy in the Glidden Tour) to look after their interests on the coast during the absence of Mr. Hood. Mr. Hood will visit New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Boston, Buffalo, Detroit, Chicago, St. Louis, and Kansas City and will return to the coast about April 1.

The Stevens-Duryea factory will have eight models in their list of 1910 cars which will include two sizes of limousines, large and small touring cars, two sizes of short coupled cars, and a runabout.

The Pioneer Automobile Company reports the sale of a seven passenger Chalmers-Detroit "forty" and a Hudson Runabout to Mr. W. L. Growall of this city. Mr. Growall is a recent convert to motor cars, his first being a Chalmers "thirty" purchased last season. Both Mr. and Mrs. Growall drove their car last season and without chauffeur the trip was made to Los Angeles. The new touring car will be used for touring between their country place and the city during the summer season. The Hudson runabout will be used for a station wagon. Delivery will be made about the first of the year.

The Pioneer Automobile Company recently delivered to Philip Clay one of the large seven passenger Thomas touring cars. This car has some special features, particularly its color which was the selection of Mrs. Clay and makes it very attractive.

C. E. Green of the Crocker National Bank has placed his order for the first long wheel base, short coupled Stevens car that will arrive.

Did he tell you he lived in a flat?

No; but I met him looking around for a dwarf Christmas tree.

Cemetery Gleanings

In a very old churchyard on Long Island a moss-covered, time-stained block commemorates a calamity in these words:

"Father and I lies here together.
Both lost at sea with a vessel went down with thirty other souls, with not one body ever recovered.
Father lies here and I over there."

In Eastern Vermont is a tomb-stone sacred to the memory of a certain Mrs. Hinckley. A few months after her death, according to the testimony of the stones, her little girl followed her to the well-known bourne that forbids the return of travelers, and the doubly-bereaved husband and father thus apostrophizes his daughter:

"Go sleep with ma, Alminy B,
Soon pa will come and sleep with thee."

Apparently Deacon Hinckley saw reason to change his plans, for in his modest inclosure are monumental tablets sacred to the memory of his three subsequent wives.

The epitaph on a tomb in Staffordshire says, incoherently and quaintly:

"Broken on the wheel of time
The body is the spirit's rinde.
Living with a crown in heaven
My age was three times eleven."

Of the sex and condition of this person of thirty-three no record remains, as the upper half of the thick stone has broken or crumbled away. The following epitaph is over the grave of Miss Nott, a maiden lady, in Oxfordshire:

"Nott born, Nott dead, Nott christened,
Nott begot;
So here she lies that was and that was Nott.
Reader, behold a wonder rarely wrought,
Which, while thou seemest to read thou readest Nott."

The inscription on the monument of two little girls in England runs:

"To the memory of Emma and Maria Littleboy, the twin children of George and Emma Littleboy, of Hornsey, who died July 16, 1783.

Two Littleboys lie here,
Yet strange to say,
These Littleboys are girls."

The following curious epitaph is taken from a tombstone in a church of Coventry:

Here lyes an old toss'd Tennis Ball
Was racketted, from spring to fall,
With so much heat and so much hast,
Time's arm for shame grew tyred at last.
Four kings in camps he truly served,
And from his loyalty ne'er swerved.
Father ruin'd and son slighted,
And from the Crown ne'er requited.
Loss of estate, relations, blood,
Was too well known, but did no good;
With long Campaigns and paines o' th' gout
He cou'd no longer hold it out.
Always a restless life he led,
Never at quiet till quite dead.
He marry'd in his later days
One who exceeds the common praise
But wanting breath still to make known
Her true affection and his own,
Death kindly came, all wants supplied
By giving rest—which life deny'd.

In a Massachusetts graveyard of great antiquity is this memorial of an unfortunate sailor, who plaintively proclaims:

"I lost my life on the raging seas
A sovereign God does as he please."

Out of Date

The flimsy things of paper lace
And Cupids bearing darts
Are out of date and out of place,
So few of us have hearts.

Say, boss, can't yer give er feller a dime? I ain't had nothin' ter eat fer two days.

Lucky devil! Why, I had to eat two Christmas dinners yesterday.

A new and very stringent prohibitory law has just been put into effect in Kansas. A stranger went into a Kansas drug store and asked for some whisky, which was refused.

"But I'm ill," persisted the stranger.

"That won't help any," replied the druggist. "It don't make any difference. I can't sell you any whisky for being ill."

"Well, what can you sell it to me for?" asked the stranger.

"The only thing we can sell whisky for in this town," said the druggist, "is for snake-bites. Hold up, now; don't ask me where to get bitten. No use. There is only one snake in the town, and he is engaged for three weeks ahead."

"My husband is such a good man! He looks after my toilettes with such care.

"Yes, I noticed he looks rather careworn."

A Popular Caprice

What seems to be proof of a predilection to whimsicality in this aspiring and energetic community was given last week when the people attached the drag-chain of municipal ownership to the chariot of progress. That there was something of whimsicality in the performance seems evident inasmuch as but a month ago the people loudly affirmed that they were not in sympathy with corporation-baiters nor prejudiced against the damnable purpose of rapacious captains of industry to make of this city a stronghold of capital. Having voted for municipal ownership they have served notice on capital that it must be wary in considering opportunities for investment hereabouts as the people have greater faith in politicians than in private citizens that are obsessed with a passion for accumulating millions under the banner that bears the ugly device of the vulgar dollar. But whether this was exactly the sentiment which the people desired to express God only knows. It is the difficulty of interpreting the voice of the people which gives it a resemblance to the voice of Heaven. It is never possible to determine what is the precise inspiration of anything that comes out of the depths of that unfathomable deep which we call public opinion. In this instance, if we are to judge from the arguments presented by the advocates of the bond issue, the people acted from divers motives; some from dissatisfaction with the street car service, holding the company entirely responsible for disadvantages under which it has been compelled to labor; some from sympathy with the men that bequeathed to San Francisco a heritage of rancor and revenge; others, and by far the most numerous element, from a desire to strengthen the position of organized labor, believing as they do that a municipal road will fix the standard of wages and hours. Perhaps there were some enlightened citizens, abounding in civic pride, who voted for the bonds to add to the severity of the test of the wonderful recuperative powers of this laughter-loving Paris of America.

Municipal Ownership

If there is anything in municipal ownership to commend it to the intelligence of an enlightened community it is something exasperatingly elusive, for it has baffled the most patient and intelligent research and study. We are told that municipal ownership is almost as full of great principles of political wisdom as the laws of Moses and the history of the kings of Israel and Judah, but where they are to be found enumerated nobody knows. The only obvious theory upon which it can be recommended is that popular management of public utilities is divinely inspired. But certainly it cannot be affirmed of the people that they are seldom guilty of mismanagement. Even that incredible and credulous person, the average citizen who voted for the bond issue, prey though he is to many delusions, is not unaware of the conspicuous inefficiency of whatever service is rendered by the people through their darling agents. Indeed the average citizen complains of nothing so much as of the things that are done under the supervision of the people. He knows that the people spend half their time devising ways and means of rendering negligible the machinations of their servants. No department of government is handled to the satisfaction of the average citizen. Even the administration of justice, which is one of the most important functions of the sovereign people, according to common report, is far from what it should be. The fact is notorious that no department of government renders any kind of service at reasonable cost. Such being the case what advantage does the average citizen expect to derive from broadening the functions of government? If we are to judge from the maunderings of the advocates of municipal ownership, the advantage to be derived is rather of a moral than of an economic nature, it being their theory that public service corporations are a source of iniquity, and that by abolishing them we shall eliminate some of the impurities that befoul the political atmosphere. If this theory is sound municipal ownership has some merit, but not enough to arouse our enthusiasm.

The Amended Monroe Doctrine

Once more the Monroe Doctrine is perturbing our British cousins. They have been watching with profound interest the brandishing of the Big Stick in Nicaragua, and it has occurred to them that we are gradually establishing a practical protectorate over Central America. Incidentally an alarming prospect is unfolding to their view, the prospect of a tremendous diminution of British trade in South America. At present Brazil exports more than double the amount to this country than she does to England, but she takes from England nearly three times as much as she does from us; and the trade of Chile with England is both in imports and exports treble that with the United States, while in the case of Argentina the trade relations with England are still more favorable. Now the press of England is predicting the loss of this enormous trade and basing the prediction on the failure of the British Government to stay the development of new principles under the Monroe Dostrine, which was originally a non-aggressive republican doctrine, but which under Imperialist expansion, is becoming a menace to the independence of the South and Central American Republics. The British press is certainly taking a correct view of the matter. But the principle on which we are acting is precisely the same as that on which the Powers of Europe justify the hegemony which they exercise over some of their feeble but troublesome neighbors. We began to broaden our policy with respect to the Latin States to the south of us about the time that we took over the Panama Canal and personally conducted a revolution in Columbia preparatory to setting up a new State. It was then that we indirectly asserted our right to interfere in the internal affairs of a country protected by the Monroe Doctrine for the purpose of setting them straight. Now we are acting without any attempt at subterfuge. No longer need there be any speculation as to our policy. We indicated it quite clearly when we refused to allow the Danish Ministry to sell St. Thomas, St. Croix and St. John to Germany. Informally notice has been served upon the world that the United States intends to have, when the Panama Canal is finished, a grip upon the whole strategical position from Florida to Venezuela. And of course trade will follow the flag.

The Demon Triumphs

The Prohibition cause has received its first serious setback in the South. Reports hitherto made of revulsion of public sentiment as to prohibition have been premature. Until the recent election in Alabama the liquor interests had not won anywhere on a clean-cut issue, but in Alabama the direct question was submitted to the people, and there were no other issues to complicate the situation or confuse the people. The result was in every way a complete surprise to the enemies of the Demon. Prior to the election sentiment was believed to be so much in favor of the Prohibitionists that they gladly welcomed the opportunity to submit their cause to the people. The question was upon the adoption of a constitutional amendment. As the Legislature out of deference to what it conceived to be public sentiment had passed a State-wide prohibition law, a constitutional amendment was really unnecessary, but the Prohibitionists thought it a good opportunity to clinch prohibition by putting it in the Constitution of the State. A majority of the counties, including urban centres had already separately voted for prohibition, and it was estimated upon the basis of the returns at these elections that there was a prohibition majority in the State of from 20,000 to 25,000. So little doubt was there of public sentiment that Governor Comer, who led the prohibition forces, staked his political future on the result, and the members of the Legislature with their ears to the ground affected a righteous hostility to the liquor interests. Even the wise politicians made forecasts upon the strength of which they climbed into the prohibition band wagon and began quarreling over the division of the offices at the next State election. The campaign ended with the Prohibitionists assured of a great triumph, and then the people went to the polls and defeated the proposed amendment by a vote of two to one. The explanation of this great change of sentiment is that prohibition had proved a too expensive moral uplift. Once more has it been demonstrated that the moral tone of the masses is not to be elevated if the process is to cost them anything. The good people of Alabama, even those of the rural districts, who, doubtless have a superfetation of righteousness and a holy horror of urban dissipations, have signified their willingness to compromise with the Demon on a cash basis. The closing of the saloons in Alabama had decreased the revenue of the State, and it became evident that for the State to meet its just obligations it would be necessary to increase taxes. Hence the change of sentiment toward the haunts of sinners where wet goods are dispensed. And now the Prohibitionists of the South are in a state of panic. Nowhere in the South has prohibition been so strong as in Alabama. Now there is expectation of an anti-prohibition wave in Louisiana, Georgia and Mississippi.

The Omnipotent Commission

President Taft is kindly credited by the Hearst papers with having "placed his finger on a raw spot in American jurisprudence when he commented on the slowness and expensiveness of legal processes," but of course the President "did not say enough" on this important subject; for, "it is not enough that the mills of justice should grind a little faster"; the problem is "to put poor litigants on precisely the same footing as rich ones." Indeed this is the problem of the hour, and the Hearst papers demand its solution. It is suggested by them that the President should get from Congress the power to create a commission to look into this matter, and it is hoped by them that he will appoint commissioners "with an eye for essentials, men who will not be content with frittering palliatives." There's nothing to beat a commission in solving problems of paramount importance. Whatever ails the body politic can be cured by a commission provided it has an eye for essentials and a contempt for "frittering palliatives." Even the imperfect and unsatisfactory state of affairs resulting from the blunders of Providence can be rectified by an omnipotent commission. Take for example the state of affairs to which President Taft's attention has been called by the Hearst papers, the matter of the disadvantage from which the poor suffer when engaged in litigation with the rich. This is a disadvantage for which Providence is believed to be largely responsible. Since the world was young there have been rich people and poor people, and the rich have always enjoyed certain material advantages over the poor. Persons of shallow understanding are of the opinion that the poor will never be able to get a square deal until mankind are reduced to a level and absolute equality is realized, but persons of superior intelligence, editors of the Hearst newspapers, for example, know that it is possible for the inequality of conditions to be extinguished so far as the administration of justice is concerned. The achievement, as they know, is not beyond the capacity of a commission, and hence the suggestion which President Taft has taken under advisement.

Uniform Divorce Laws

Among those students of social problems who have devoted themselves particularly to the consideration of the divorce question in this country, it has for many years been a generally accepted theory that a uniform American divorce law is one of the great reforms necessary to the safeguarding of the family relation. Those who look upon marriage as a religious sacrament have of course insisted on the necessity of moral discipline if husband and wife are to live together in long continued happiness; while those who regard marriage as a contractual relation which may be voided if one or other of the contracting parties fails to satisfy his obligations, have demanded that the terms of the contract be not too loosely construed and that the opportunities for breaking it be as much as possible restricted. But whichever way marriage be regarded, it remains true that both the theologian and the sociologist agree in demanding that the divorce laws of the country be made uniform. It has been stated that if it were as difficult to obtain a divorce in Nevada where the most trivial excuses are gravely accepted, as it is in New York where there is but one ground for separation, the divorce evil would to a great extent be remedied. It has been pointed out that with some States granting absolute decrees of divorce immediately on the hearing of the cause, and with others granting interlocutory decrees, there is bound to be a confusion, not to say demoralization, of marital relations. So the efficacy of a uniform divorce law has been looked upon as logically demonstrated. But the time has come when the efficacy of the uniform divorce law as a remedy must be critically examined. As so often happens American students have been investigating the home problem without reference to the study of similar problems abroad. Just at the present moment facts and figures from abroad cast heavy doubt upon the merits of the uniform divorce law propaganda. Figures culled from the latest United States Census Report on Marriage and Divorce seem to show that the uniform divorce law is not the remedy for the divorce evil. The case of Germany is in point. The number of divorces in Germany increased gradually from 1882 to 1893. During the decade ending in 1893 the increase was 1008, an average of 100.8 per year. During the period 1893-99 the increase amounted to 2,739 or an average of 456.5 per year. The new uniform divorce law for all Germany which went into effect in 1900 and which restricted the grounds of divorce for about two-thirds of the population, occasioned a decrease of 1,505 in the number of divorces for that year while the number remained practically stationary during 1901. But from 1901 to 1906 the increase went on at a rate far more rapid than during the years immediately preceding 1900, averaging 843 per year. Similar figures are given in the report for Hungary which, under a uniform divorce law, has shown a marked increase of divorces. The figures of the report seem to indicate that a uniform divorce law would not reduce divorces materially. The pet remedy, it would seem, must be restudied in the light of these disconcerting statistics.

From My Maiden Aunt

A Christmas Present in the Shape of a Collection of Bachelor Reflections Which Seems to Indicate That the Thoughts of This Species Run in a Very Circumscribed Channel

By Robert McTavish

For a Christmas present a maiden aunt gave me a little book entitled "Reflections of a Bachelor." I do not know why my maiden aunt picked out this particular little book for me; but then no man ever did fathom the mental process which is at work in women—maiden aunts or others—when they buy books for Christmas presents. They never buy men the kind of books which men want. For men who abominate poetry they invariably buy a copy of Tennyson or Byron or Whittier beautifully bound in stuffed covers and gilt. For men who have no time for novels they invariably buy the latest best-selling crudity of fiction. And when they are in doubt about poetry and fiction they apparently buy books like this "Reflections of a Bachelor." Knowing my sterling character, my maiden aunt should not have made me this particular present except by way of a joke. But knowing my aunt, I am sure she was not in a jocular mood when she shopped for my Christmas present. My aunt is no more jocular than I am giddy. So the mystery of why she presented me with the "Reflections of a Bachelor" done up in a plaid cover with the picture of a bald-headed gentleman in evening dress on it, must remain unsolved. I presume that the bald-headed gentleman is the bachelor whose reflections are contained in the book. I presume too that the marginal decorations of the book are designed to give me an inkling of the sort of life this bachelor lives. There are champagne buckets and bottles with popping corks, burning cigars, guitars and roses, cards and poker chips, whisky decanters and, to cap all, strings of hearts, grinning masks and women's pictures, dangled by fat Cupids. It reminds me of some of the bachelor "dens"—appropriate word!—that I have been in.

The suspicion aroused by the general get-up of the book that the bachelor is a gay dog is amply warranted, for his reflections deal largely and frankly with wine, women and song, but especially with women. Now bachelors undoubtedly think about women, but I do not think that they think about women as much as this reflective bachelor is represented as doing. Neither do I think that bachelors of the ordinary or club variety devote to women's mysteries the persistent attention which the bald-headed gentleman of my book shows. When I call them "women's mysteries" I am speaking guardedly out of a sense of modesty. The bachelor of this book evidently has no modesty, for certainly there is nothing guarded about his utterances on these subjects. In the first place they seem not to be mysteries to him at all; he knows all about them and discourses of them with utter abandon. I did not know whether I should blush or not when I read some of the bachelor's reflections on what I have lamely designated "women's mysteries." I had an uneasy sense that to blush would be to acknowledge an almost guilty knowledge of what the bachelor was talking about; whereas on the other hand, not to blush, even in the privacy of my room, at some of his sallies would self-convict me of being case hardened. The matter was further complicated because I did not understand all that the bachelor wrote. But I don't think I blushed very much.

The bachelor's reflections about women might very easily be tabulated under three heads, Woman's Shape, Woman's Stockings, Woman's Lingerie. Just look at that tabulation and tell me if this is not a very remarkable bachelor. How many bachelors of your acquaintance devote their reflective minutes to these things? But our bachelor is an adept in saying things about these mysteries; for of course these are things which are or ought to be mysteries not understood by man. Let us listen to some of the bachelor's reflections that come under the first category:

Generally when women are careless about the way their legs can be seen, there is a good reason for it.

It's queer what wrong ideas you can get about a woman's figure in anything but a bathing suit.

To be anything of a success a woman has got to have some place where she is stout.

The pleasantest surprise is the slim girl who is not slim in spots.

By a woman's arm you shall know the rest of her.

A woman can't be too careful about what parts of her are stout.

A thin woman that isn't thin all over is the kind that appeals to a man.

A woman can be awful big in spots without letting anybody know it when she is all dressed up.

Women with big feet don't always keep on that way all the way up.

Some women lose their figure as often as they undress.

In these sentences we seem to have the bachelor at his best. This sort of musing seems just to tickle him to death, for he is always indulging in it. But is it true that bachelors are given to this sort of anatomical reflection? that fatness and leanness occupy so much of their thoughts when they think of the ladies? But let us listen to the bachelor again:

One stocking doesn't make a set of tights.

When a girl has dimples on her knees it is a sign she is proud of them.

When a man gives a woman a jeweled garter it is a sign he ought not to, unless she is his wife, when he won't.

The most innocent girl that ever lived never was ambitious to climb an apple tree unless she had on her best stockings.

No man can be sure of what he might do till he has been tempted with openwork stockings.

It's odd what dull things a woman's stockings are when they are merely hanging out in the wash.

The girl who knows her business would rather have what's in it pretty than the stocking itself.

All of these reflections I do not profess to understand, but I have my doubts whether they are the sort which a maiden aunt should encourage her nephew to indulge. And getting to the third category, Woman's Lngerie, I think the same remark will apply to the following, culled at random:

It keeps a man awful busy keeping track of how the fashions change in some of the women's clothes that he is not expected to know about.

If a girl were stone-blind she wouldn't want all those frills and fussy things that nobody ever sees but herself.

Some kinds of women's clothes don't seem to be made for any other reason except to make men wonder how they can find out about them.

It's funny that the women's clothes that are never seen are mostly made for show.

That ought to be enough to convince any liberal person that my aunt was indiscreet in making me this Christmas present. This bachelor is too knowing for me to fathom and of course I can't ask my aunt to explain the reflections which I do not understand. That might work a coolness between us. This bald-headed bachelor, by the way, when he is not speaking of garters and lingerie and so on, is generally casting a slur on red hair. Being of Scotch descent I am rather partial to red hair myself and do not relish greatly such sayings as these:

Making a widow of a red-headed woman is sending coals to Newcastle.

Spread red hair over one thousand generations and it won't get lost.

When a red-headed woman is in a sweet temper it shows how deceitful women can be.

When a red-headed woman hasn't a red-headed temper it is a sign that it is bleached.

It is funny, but no matter how innocent a girl may be she will never put on pink stockings when she is going out with a red-headed man.

Red hair isn't even better than no hair.

You can manufacture blonde hair, but red hair just comes natural.

Shades of gentle Ik Marvel! Is it with meditations like these that your twentieth century successor amuses his lonely leisure? Are these the thoughts that come to him from the fireplace? I think they are rather inspired by the steam radiator. This bachelor does not worship women as a divinity like you did; he is a peeping Tom and unashamed. I wish my aunt had given me a copy of your sweet old Reveries.

Prophetic Paragraphs

Culled on a Journey into Futurity from the Columns of Certain Conscientious Contemporaries That Are Ever Pregnant With Wisdom and Generous With Counsel

(THE EXAMINER, A. D. 1921)

It is now exactly eleven years, two months, one week and three days since the people of this city voted to issue bonds for the building of a municipal railroad on Geary street. The road is now in operation from Kearny street to Devisadero. At this rate of progress the city will not be able to carry passengers to the ocean over the municipal road until the close of the first half of the century. WHO is responsible for this dilatoriness? This is a question that the PEOPLE have a right to ask, and the EXAMINER with its traditional loyalty to the interests of the PEOPLE demands an answer. If it is not received at once the PEOPLE shall know the reason why. Let there be no attempt at subterfuge or equivocation, for the PEOPLE are in no mood to be trifled with. We hereby inform the Mayor of this city, the Hon. E. P. E. Troy, that it is his duty to ascertain why there has been so much delay in the construction of this road. He has been in office nearly two years, and he is responsible for the acts of his subordinates. The PEOPLE look to him for an explanation. Let it be forthcoming.

This great municipal enterprise has been the source of much humiliation to the PEOPLE of San Francisco. When they decided, just eleven years, two months, one week and three days ago, to emancipate themselves from the thraldom of the robber barons who had a monoply of the traction business in this city they were filled with high hope and imbued with the finest quality of enthusiasm. They had abundant reason to expect an early and happy fruition of their enterprise, and when on that memorable first of January, 1910, the Examiner announced the resolution of our city authorities to MAKE THE DIRT FLY without delay there was rejoicing from the water front to the county line. We must confess, parenthetically, that knowing something of the perversity of politicians we had misgivings. We had advocated the bond issue not through faith in the zeal of men that hunger for public office, but because we had confidence in the PEOPLE, who were at that time eager for municipal ownership and out of deference to whose sentiments WE OPPOSED the robber barons and DEFEATED them at the polls. The principle of public ownership did not appeal to the Examiner, but it was what the people wanted and therefore the Examiner became its arent advocate. The Examiner will always STAND OR FALL WITH THE PEOPLE. All of which we have said parentheically.

Now let us return to the road itself, THE PEOPLE'S ROAD, and inquire why it is that things ARE AS THEY ARE. The PEOPLE, as we have said, have suffered humiliation. They expected to build the road for about two million dollars, and though it has already cost five million it is not half finished. The cars now in operation are dilapidated, and they are never kept clean. The road is running at a loss because nobody cares to spend an hour riding such a short distance. The only gratifying result of this experiment in municipal ownership is that it has REDUCED the hours and RAISED the wages of carmen.

(THE BOUGHTEN BULLETIN, A. D. 1921)

It is now apparent to everybody that the municipal street railroad is a failure. That being the case there is but one thing to do—turn it over to private ownership. The Supervisors are discussing the advisability of putting the franchise up at auction. This is a proposition to which the Bulletin is unalterably opposed. It is apparent that this proposition emanates from the United Railroads which already has a monoply of the subway and surface business. Two of our most distinguished citizens, the Hon. Rudolph Spreckels and the Hon. James D. Phelan, are willing to accept this franchise for the benefit of the people, and to substitute for the conduit system, which is now admittedly a nuisance, a fine trolley system. Here is an excellent opportunity to encourage disinterested local capital, and in the circumstances the Bulletin cannot conceive how honest officials can conscientiously hesitate between the two propositions.

(THE CALL, A. D. 1921)

The municipal street railroad problem is again up for solution before the Supervisors. The Call is of course in favor of abandoning the municipal ownership fad. Under the present management the Call has not been under any misapprehension regarding municipal ownership. It is, as we have frequently said, an abomination. The people have been robbed right and left since they sold the bonds for the building of this road, and they are now heartily in favor of selling the franchise. The Call makes this statement boldly in accordance with the best traditions of a paper that has never failed to read public sentiment correctly. At the same time the Call protests against the proposition to turn the road over to those perennial schemers, James D. Phelan and Rudolph Spreckels, who have again returned to power. The Supervisors like good dogs are showing a disposition to eat out of their hands. In view of the current ambition of these millionaires it is interesting to recall that they were instrumental in persuading the people to embrace the white elephant from which they are now seeking release. The question may well be asked, Were these men gifted with prescience when they urged the people to engage in municipal ownership?

One Thousand Two Hundred Frozen Men

By Aage Madelung

He was standing at one of the entrances to the narrow foyer in the small wooden theatre of the town. It looked more like an old stable with carved wood gables than the playhouse of a provincial capital.

The crowd thronged and jostled one another in two opposite currents in the narrow passage. A hot atmosphere of couples, closely united, and burnt cigarette paper hung about the place.

I recognized him at once, as I saw him standing there, watching the people like a stranger, and yet like an old acquaintance. Just how you would look when returning after a long absence to a place where you used to know everybody. You somehow try to get a firm footing on the outstretched palms of the hands that bid you welcome. . . . He certainly had been away for a long time, quite an eternity. . . . So much had happened meanwhile.

He looked as though he had had rather a bad time of it. He had lost flesh, and there was a sort of haggard look about him. The "ladies' doctor," "the chocolate boy," we used to call him before he went away. He was wonderfully hale at that time, hearty and delighted with life and with his wife, who bore him no children. Rather pleased with himself, too. He used to find a particular pleasure in relating what his lady patients looked like inside. He was thoroughly versed in those matters. As for being mistaken, no fear of that, when about 90 per cent of them . . . . He didn't even lose countenance when he surpassed the limit of the 90 per cent, and thereby ruined a whole family, the husband blowing his brains out.

"How do you do?" said I, shaking hands. "So you have come back?"

"Yes, I have come back," he answered vaguely, blinking his eyes.

I looked at his uniform, which made me think of a squaring of accounts I once had had with him.

"How did you get into those clothes?" I asked. "Isn't it a police uniform?"

"It's that of an army surgeon," he replied pompously, pushing out his chest, so that my eyes caught sight of the Stanislaus Cross.

"How did you come by that?"

"I was assistant to the head doctor," he said brokenly between his teeth, and speaking with difficulty.

I never could abide gossip from men, and now I stood and reflected on this. But he evidently had forgotten the incident. . . . Clearly . . . . he had forgotten it, sore as he was up to the skin of his skull. . . .

"Yes, I remember. You had to go up there and change practice, so to speak. Where did you fall in with them?"

"After the battle of Laojan."

"Then you were present at the flight from Mukden?"

His mouth fell; his eyes looked glassy.

"How did it happen?" I asked, and forgot quite suddenly that I had disliked the chocolate boy before he got mixed up in the war—against his will—and had seen the day of Mukden.

But he said nothing, only waved his hand. It looked as though he was searching for words and found none.

"Do tell a single episode out of that race for death."

But he only continued to wave his hand.

"There isn't anything to tell; there are no episodes. It stands out in memory like one great, red flaring fact. The White Man chased by the Yellow! That is all. There is no more to tell. Let everyone rave about that subject as much as he likes. Matter enough in it to last for the next thousand years!"

"But surely you must be able to remember some moments during the rout when you didn't look at it as a fixed and complete historical moment. Were you not wounded?"

"No, never; though through all the affair I was in the front rank—or, if you prefer to put it that way, in the rear."

"Didn't you soon get used to it?"

"Yes. As soon as you have been under fire you think no more about it."

"I mean, didn't you soon get used to the wounds, and—and all that amputated life?"

"By and by we all of us got wounded—in our nerves. You understand? Many of them didn't know it, but their relations and friends are sure to have noticed it, when they returned."

"Oh!" he whispered, "I wonder—didn't all of them, all the world, notice it? I used to have pretty strong nerves." His face twitched again. "But now I am going abroad—for a cure."

"You won't get leave. There is a great need of doctors just now in the war against 'internal enemies.'"

"Oh, no! Not I! Never! I have had enough of it!" He made an impatient gesture and smiled—a strange, helpless smile. There was something at once terrible and fascinating about that smile, something rigid and mad, that melted into a sort of voluptuousness. . . .

"You laugh?" I said, and looked at him.

He cleared his throat and painfully tried to recover himself. "I'm going abroad," he said apologetically in an undertone.

At this moment the bell rang from behind the scenes. The "Violin Virtuoso" was going to attack the last part of his program. I went back to my seat and sat there thinking of those well-meaning and kindly people who find an excuse for war and for those who make war, and who confound the struggle of the many for daily bread with the battle of one single man to steady the pillars of his throne. . . .

Equally cruel may they seem. But the one is inevitable, while the other is obsolete, because it concerns but one single man and his escutcheon, and not the masses, who all bear the same colors, deep under the shirt, where digestion begins. . . .

Memories of bygone days seized me. I seemed to hear a soft whispering of lonely firtops, gently swaying in the moonlit night.

It was Tschaikowsky's serenade.

It was like branches stirred by the wind, like chains of maidens gliding past in heavy shrouds. Pain and desire swell the fall. . . . Groans rise as if from lips stiffened in bluish-cold terror . . . and die away in a dirge for something which once has been . . . and never will be again .... never. . . .

I felt someone getting up from his seat; and when I too—overcome by the despairing hopelessness of this Never . . . never . . . rose to leave I saw it was the doctor.

He went straight to the bar and emptied a tumbler of brandy at a draught. Then he sat down at one of the small tables with red and blue covers.

"Some beer!" he cried with chattering teeth. I sat down next to him.

"Are we going to get that beer, you Adonis, eh? Another glass, please! You will take one, won't you? Or shall we have some brandy first?"

"Thanks. I never take brandy."

"As you please."

He rose, went over to the bar, and ordered another glass, which he swallowed straight off.

When he turned round again I could see the whites of his eyes. . . .

Hearst Coming to Stay Here

Without even taking his own pet newspaper into his confidence William Randolph Hearst is preparing, I am told, to astonish San Francisco by setting up his lares and penates in a California home. The news that Mr. and Mrs. Hearst are considering the advantages of spending most of their time here will come as a surprise but I have every reason to believe it to be true. The celebrated house on the bluff in Sausalito is to be rebuilt and already the plans drawn by J. C. Green, an architect of New York who accompanied Mr. Hearst to this city, have been approved. When the new place is completed it will undoubtedly be the most picturesque home across the bay.

Plans of the New Home

The plans call for an expenditure of approximately $250,000. The home will be rebuilt as a class A structure of concrete and steel in Spanish mission style with two verandas looking over the expanse of bay and out beyond the Golden Gate. Mrs. Hearst is planning the furnishing and in her home will be displayed many of the beautiful things in the celebrated art collection of the late Stanford White, the bulk of which was purchased by the Hearst family at the time of the auction and before that, at private sales. Besides this, Mr. and Mrs. Hearst have collected a wonderful array of curios here and there in their wanderings abroad, all of these things having been stored with a view of ultimately building a home in California where they will pass the tranquil years of their lives. The pillars that will support the verandas facing the bay are from an old ruined temple in Italy. They are wonderfully carved, displaying a style of workmanship now entirely forgotten. The carvings show two colors, similar to the style of a cameo pin, the upper figures being in one color in relief against another in a stone composition, the secret of which was lost at the dawn of the Christian era. The chandeliers and other ornamental parts in the interior architecture are also rare antiquities.

A Famous Bay Dwelling

The Sausalito home which is to be reconstructed was the place where Hearst dwelt in his bachelor days. Many stories of gay festivities have been told in connection with his residence there, but strangely enough, these rather wild tales have been of comparatively recent circulation and are doubtless the exaggerations of confirmed gossipers. It is more than likely that they were invented by campaign managers who sought to defeat Mr. Hearst in his various political ventures. The old place has a superb location. The front is buttressed by a high wall that looks like the ruins of a feudal castle. Odd towers break the flat line, and these are to be changed to elevators to give easy and rapid ascent to the place which at present is only reached by a corkscrew road winding about the high bluff. There will be great days when the new Hearst place is completed. Work is to be started at once. Although the grounds are very extensive, additional land was purchased recently to make the estate one of the finest on the coast.

Hearst Building to Be a Skyscraper After All

I have another interesting bit of news anent the plans of Mr. Hearst. He had not been here two days before he again won his mother, Mrs. Phoebe Hearst, to his point of view, and as a result the Hearst building at Third and Market street is to be an eighteen story structure. Architect Green has engaged a staff of assistants to change the plans which were for a nine story building. Mrs. Hearst who is advancing the capital for the erection of the building, has all along opposed the skyscraping ambitions of her son whose heart was set on having the new Examiner building the tallest in the city. As a compromise, the building was to be nine stories high with foundations so built that eight or ten additional stories could be put on at any time. Now, after the family conference and many negotiations with the architect, Mrs. Hearst has been won over and the new building is to mount upwards until it can look down on the tallest skyscraper in the city.

Will Hearst Go Into Politics Here?

It is declared by those familiar with the intimate life of Mr. and Mrs. Hearst that they are becoming more and more fond of California, but whether or not Mr. Hearst's political disappointments have anything to do with this preference, he of course does not disclose. He is said to be of the opinion that it is in the West, not the East, where men of independent thought have their opportunities today, and as he is still a man in the prime and vigor of life, it would not be surprising if the versatile and restless publisher transferred his political activities from New York to California. Those who know him declare that he has often indulged in these speculations. Considering the plans for the Sausalito home, credence may be given to these rumors.

Mrs. Scraggs—It seems like a hundred years since we married. I can't even remember when we first met.

Mr. Scraggs—I can. It was at a dinner party and there were thirteen at table.

The Job of the Hour

Who is to be Director-General of the Panama Canal Exposition? It has gradually dawned on the intellectuals of some of our leading citizens that here is a job worth striving for. The fact is that in all the length and breadth of the State there is nothing that presents opportunity for higher distinction than the office of Director-General of the mammoth fair. The average man with an instinct for eminence would rather be Director-General than Governor or even United States Senator. Beats there on no political office in the gift of the people of this State so strong a light or white as that which will be focused from all the corners of the earth on the boss of the fair. In the circumstances it may be easily conjectured that the job is not going a-begging. Lovers of the limelight are not sitting idly by waiting for the modest radiance of merit to be detected under a bushel. I am told, however, that there is one man upon whom the honor has been thrust and who has more than thrice put it off. This man in Charles C. Moore who distinguished himself as our Minister Plenipotentiary to all the courts of Europe for the greater glory of the Portola Festival. Whether Mr. M. H. De Young or James McNab are candidates for the job no one knows so far as I have been able to ascertain but both are being urged by admirers. Leon Sloss is among those mentioned; also, William F. Humphrey, President of the Olympic Club, who has made a record for executive ability and enthusiasm; also, innumerable has-beens and silurians who have been declaring themselves in on everything since the days when the waters of the bay came up to Montgomery street. Sentiment around town appears to be in favor of infusing a little new blood into this exposition enterprise and taking less seriously than has been customary a certain coterie of wax figures upon which the moss has been gathering ominously.

The Last of the Portola

There will be no more Portola celebrations; at least, not for many years to come. This decision was arrived at by the committee after quiet deliberation and has not been embodied in any report or communication to the papers. Hence it will come as a surprise to many. The committee had several circumstances in mind when it decided that the carnival should not be of yearly recurrence. The first was the big deficit which had to be made up after the revels were over. Another was a very serious doubt as to whether a yearly carnival could be made as successful as the Portola of last year. In the minds of many the novelty was one of the strongest drawing features, but they thought that it would be difficult to bring such multitudes of visitors to the city for an annual fiesta. Then again, the energetic boosters of the city are just beginning to tackle the greatest project of a lifetime—a world's fair for 1915—and they rightly consider that they have their hands full. Besides, the Native Sons expect to hold a big celebration in this city this year. So, after many arguments pro and con, it was decided that there would be no Portola this year; and if it is ever revived, it will be many years hence. Queen Vergilia I. will have no successor in this decade at least.

Hilarity Unconfined

The high-water mark of revelry was hit in this city last week when the people rejoiced at the death of the old year and celebrated the birth of the new. Never before was the vortex of dissipation so vertiginous as it was during the closing mad hours of 1909 and the opening glad hours of 1910. In life and color, sin and jollity all past records were surpassed. Even during Portola Week the spirit of gaiety never reached so high a pitch of enthusiasm. How, it may be asked, are comparisons in hilarity to be made with any degree of accuracy? What thermometer have we to register the temperature of a San Francisco saturnalia? How is it possible to record the varying intensity of riotous indulgence in fantastic amusements? Not to be able to answer these questions is to argue yourself unsophisticated. The spirit of revelry is daughter of the vine. Go ask the wine man and he will tell you what tribute was paid to Bacchus. During the hours between 7 o'clock Friday night and 7 o'clock Saturday morning there was consumed in the laughter-resounding cafes of this unconventional city a quantity of champagne sufficient to float a dreadnought. This is what tells the tale—this tremendous popping of corks, this copious flow of the thing that stimulates the jaded imagination and makes a poor Irishman feel like Croesus on his golden throne.

When Prosperity Beams

San Francisco's champagne debauch is significant of something more than the volume of joyousness that was gendered for the great mid-winter carnival. In the volume of champagne that was consumed is an illuminated index to the bank accounts of our citizens. Easy comes, easy goes is one of the maxims of this buoyant community. We are good spenders when we have the money. Just before the earthquake beer ceased to become a popular beverage in this city. Everybody was drinking wine. After the earthquake the taste for beer was revived, but as soon as the insurance companies began pouring the pactolian stream into the channels of trade the thirst for wine was resumed and it was not assuaged until Mr. Roosevelt and his disciples precipitated their artificial panic. Now it is evident that Prosperity has again embraced us with her rosy arms. When local securities took a jump the corks began to pop. In a single cafe during the New Year's celebration ten thousand dollars went into the cash drawer. The bar-keepers at the Cliff House did not go to bed till long after the seals came up on the rocks to greet the sun.

The Proprieties Unviolated

Notwithstanding the failure of the solicitous ladies of the California Club to issue their annual warning to susceptible young women, the New Year's celebration despite its resemblance to a Pagan saturnalia was not characterized, so far as may be judged from surface indications, by exceptional looseness of behaviour. Along with a thirst for wine has come an extraordinary capacity for assimilation. In all the leading cafes the bars were down, but there was no shocking transgression of the proprieties, considering the spirit of the occasion. In the wee sma' hours a few women from over the verge did a little table-dancing, but not to these have the ladies of the California Club ever addressed a message.

A McCarthy-Greenway Affiliation

A matter of some significance that should not go unrecorded occurred at Taits where Mayor-elect McCarthy and a party of friends participated mildly in the celebration. The matter of significance was the brand of wine on the table. If it had been any other brand than that which is recognized as the hallmark of the elect—Mumm's Extra Dry— it would not have occasioned remark, but with that in evidence it was at once inferred that the Czar of the Assemblies had conquested the incoming Administration. Now, among the burning questions of the hour is this one: Is the President of the Building Trades about to take the hurdles into the midst of the clan Vere-de-Vere?

Finish of a Dazzling Career

Gay Madame Barrios, widow of the assassinated president of Guatemala, has come to the last act of her wonderful career and behold—the last act is one of sordid tragedy. Almost blind, impoverished and incapable of earning a livelihood she applied for admission on New Year's day at an almshouse in her native city of New Orleans. When she was a girl in that city a gypsy fortune teller foretold some of the remarkable events which were to besprinkle her life, and her friends, gathered about the camp fire, laughed at the glittering predictions. There was one part of that fortune which Madame Barrios never forgot. The old hag ended her recital by telling the young woman that she would end her days in a poor house. Strangely enough, that part of the prediction, with several others, has been fulfilled at last. General Barrios met her in New Orleans, became madly smitten with her charms, married her and took her to Guatemala where he became president and soon surpassed the records of all the Central American rulers by the magnificence with which he kept court. Madame Barrios lived a royal life. In one of the turns of fortune in which Barrios almost lost his head, the revolutionists were on the point of killing his wife but Minster Mizner, father of the Mizner boys of this city, stepped in and saved her life.

The Famous Barrios Diamonds

When President Barrios was killed by a crazy Teuton, Madame Barrios escaped on a Pacific Mail steamer but before leaving Guatemala, she had the presence of mind to gather up a fortune in jewels and securities. She decided to make her home in this city. I remember her very well when she lived in a handsome residence in Webster street. She had turned thirty then, was still a very pronounced blonde, thanks to the dermatologists, but had lost those finer shades of beauty that distinguished her as a girl. With her was her private secretary, a handsome dashing fellow, some ten years her junior. Apparently he looked after everything, managed the cash and the household and took all the care and responsibility off her hands. It was he who cleverly managed the landing in this country of the famous Barrios diamonds. Everybody knew they were coming and all the jewel mongers wanted to get a peep at them. But when the custom house officers came to examine the jewels with a view to collecting duty on them, everybody was surprised to learn that the bulk of the collection was paste. The doleful widow paid the small duty with a long face. Quietly the story got about later that while all eyes were concentrated on the paste jewels, coming in openly and above board, the real gems were smuggled ashore.

When Ward McAllister Blushed

Madame Barrios spent part of her time at the Hotel Rafael and was entertained by several of our society women. Ward McAllister was one of the guests. It was popularly supposed that the proper means of communication with the dashing widow was the diplomatic tongue, so McAllister who boasted of his great fluency in that medium was chosen to escort her to the dining room. As he offered his arm he said with an elaborate bow and to the admiration of everybody in the party: "Je suis Monsieur McAllistaire." Madame Barrios replied in faultless Parisian but McAllister who could not make good on his boasted familiarity with the language, stammered and floundered and almost collapsed in his chair. Discretion prompted silence until the lady turned to him, saying with a charming southern accent, "But why speak French, Mr. McAllister? I was born in New Orleans, you know."

The Beginning of the End

Madame Barrios left this city for the East, burning with ambition to win success on the stage. Her youthful secretary accompanied her. How much money they had no one knew, but it was all that was left of the fortune gathered by Barrios. While in this city her personal expenses easily topped two thousand dollars a month and that was at a time when she was supposed to be too deeply in mourning to add much to the enrichment of the shopkeepers. When she reached New York she yielded still more to her love of splendid surroundings and the glamor of gay scenes and stories reached westward indicating that the moneybags were being rapidly drained. During her eastern reign she had the reputation of being the most beautiful woman in New York society, although she had achieved no such fame among our splendid women. Certainly she was more talked and written about than any other woman in the country. She gave entertainments that were sensational in their magnificence and up to the time of the well-remembered Bradley Martin and Vanderbilt balls, her bal masque ranked as the costliest function ever given in New York.

Now It Is All Over

Finally Madame Barrios was plunged into financial difficulties and we heard little more about her. I think that she went later to Paris and I have an indistinct recollection that she took a second husband, one Senor de Roda, who died about ten years ago. Where and how she has been spending her declining years I do not know. Her life was a life of melodrama and it was dramatically fitting though exceedingly pitiful that she should have gone knocking at the door of an almshouse in her native city the other day. Poor Madame Barrios! One is tempted to moralize on her rise, her brilliant career and her terrible fall, but what's the use? It is the old old story and probably the gypsy who foretold the poorhouse, read it in an old old book.

Marine Artist Makes His Home Here

San Francisco's art colony has just gained a distinguished member in Charles H. Grant, the well known marine painter. Mr. Grant came here from the East some time ago in order to execute a number of big commissions and has made his headquarters in the Hotel Argonaut in the lobby of which several of his best canvases are hung. Like many others of the artistic temperament who have seen many lands, he has been enthralled by the spirit of the city and has at last made up his mind that its atmosphere is so inspiring that he must make his home here. Mr. Grant is a painter in the heyday of his power, having been born at Oswego, New York, in 1866. He studied at the National Academy of Design in New York and afterwards became one of the five American pupils the great marine painter, M. F. H. DeHaas, allowed himself to have. This great artist was the court painter to the Queen of Holland and had been variously decorated and honored by other sovereigns; it is not too much to say that he inspired his pupil with his own high ideals of art. Among the pictures by Mr. Grant which have won particular praise from discriminating critics are "Homeward Bound," "Ahead, Full Speed," "Will the Anchor Hold?" "Safe in Port," "Passing the Light," "At the Mercy of Neptune" and "Ship off the Starboard Bow." In these and others Mr. Grant has succeeded with wonderful technical skill in depicting the poetry that abides in the vivid dangers of the sea. There is a rare beauty of line and coloring in his seascapes which commends them to the connoisseur while their vivid telling of stories makes them of particular interest to those who are less capable of appreciating the technique of art.

A Picture for Lucien Young

At the present time Mr. Grant is engaged on a very interesting commission. He is painting for Commander Lucien Young a large canvas commemorating the battle of Manzanillo of which Young was the hero. Those who have heard Commander Young tell the story of that engagement of the Cuban campaign will never forget it. Commander Young was dispatched by Admiral Sampson to Manzanillo with the order to wipe out "a couple of gunboats" lying there. Young had a converted yacht called "The Hist," a smaller yacht called "The Hornet" and a government tug. With this modest flotilla he steamed to Manzanillo and found twelve Spanish crafts of various descriptions. There were also four strongly garrisoned forts, two regiments of riflemen entrenched behind a stone wall on the water front and several pieces of artillery masked in a quay of mango bushes that formed one side of the channel. In steaming between the forts and the quay of mango bushes to attack the Spanish ships, "The Hist" had a narrow escape from destruction. The yacht's cable caught up a torpedo and when it had been disentangled it was found that a barnacle under the trigger had prevented the mine from exploding. Its explosion would have blown "The Hist" out of the water. After an engagement of several hours Commander Young demolished the forts, silenced the rifle fire and put all of the Spanish vessels out of commission, suffering only slight casualties. As Commander Young has been ordered to Washington where, it is said, he will be made an admiral in March, this picture will be sent East, but as Mr. Grant intends giving an exhibition soon, local art lovers will probably have a chance to view it before it leaves the city. Guided by Commander Young's description, Mr. Grant has chosen the most stirring moment of the fight and the canvas bids fair to be a splendid rendition of modern naval warfare in its most picturesque phase. Later Mr. Grant will undoubtedly find many themes for his work in the ocean and bay activity about this city and it may safely be predicted that his canvases will be eagerly sought after by local art lovers.

Our Talented Servants

In moments of biliousness and scepticism I have felt that the people were generally most unfortunate in their choice of talent for almost every purpose under the sun, so it is refreshing to receive the unequivocal assurance of that retiring public servant, the Hon. James A. Johnston, that so far as the Administration of which he is a conspicuous component part is concerned it has been the rule to deal in behalf of the taxpayers with none but specialists of the first rank. This assurance is not merely refreshing; it is instructive, compelling as it does an amended appraisement of the talent that has been feeding at the public crib during the past two years. Take for example the medical talent in the department of public health. It is not, as I supposed, receiving education at the expense of the taxpayers. It is talent that has been trained to the minute. So likewise is the talent in the department of public work under the guidance of which one hundred cisterns have been constructed to increase the facilities for extinguishing fires. If the propensity of these cisterns to exude water is such that they cannot be conscientiously accepted it does not follow that the specifications were faulty. Whatever is the matter with them must be attributed to Providence whose ways are mysterious and not to be comprehended. In view of Supervisor Johnston's assurance there is no escape from the conclusion that Marsden Manson is one of the country's most renowned engineers.

A Clergyman's Charming Sentiment

Supervisor Johnston is not the only person well pleased with the achievements of the Administration which now happens to be bankrupt in public estimation. Supervisor Johnston may point with pride to the fact that his luminous judgment accords with that of the Rev. David J. Evans, who, by a curious coincidence, is like Johnston in process of retiring at this time, being on the point of evacuating Grace Episcopal Church and carrying the light of the Gospel into benighted Palo Alto. This zealous clergyman has been engaged in his favorite occupation of talking for publication. He is quoted in the Examiner thus: "The best thing for San Francisco in the next year would be for the incoming Administration of P. H. McCarthy to emulate the honorable and high-principled regime of Dr. Taylor." This unquestionably is a heartfelt sentiment. When Dr. Evans develops a passionate attachment for either an abstract or a concrete idea he becomes a thorough-paced partisan. As Dr. Taylor was discovered and branded by the little coterie of canting patriots of which Dr. Evans is the mouthpiece and echo the reverend gentleman is convinced that he is beyond reproach and by far the greatest public servant the community has ever seen. Let it not be inferred, however, that Dr. Evans is a bigot. He is only hearty and enthusiastic in defence of the interests of men in whose motives he has confidence. With so good a gentleman it would be a pleasure to agree, but I cannot bring myself to wish the Mayor-elect such ill-luck as that he should prove himself a worthy successor of the gentleman who once upon a time had no scruple against appointing a committee of partisans to whitewash a certain band of self-righteous patriots. But there is no immediate danger of Dr. Taylor being emulated by anybody. That would be impossible. The giving away of a public building is an achievement that requires a nerve that is born not oftener than once in a century. Besides there are no more moot questions of pronunciation to be settled in the interest of the peace and dignity of a fastidious community.

Mrs. De Flirte—Jack, that man hasn't taken his eyes off me for a full half hour.

Mr. De Flirte—How do you know?

Phil Wants to Know

The Hon. Phil Stanton of Los Angeles is immersed in a quandary and he has sent all the way to San Francisco a Macedonian cry for help. The tragic perplexity of this eminent statesman is due to a lively sense of his peculiar fitness for the office of Governor. Now he is ready and willing to shoulder the burdens of that laborious office, and though he knows there are many among his neighbors who would like to see him distributing State patronage, he does not know with what degree of enthusiasm he is regarded by voters far from the scene of his present intolerable passivity. Hence the cry that has been heard in the local haunts of politicians. All the way from Los Angeles has come a confidential agent of Mr. Stanton to ascertain what the sentiment is with respect to the Speaker of the last Assembly in these parts. Singularly enough nobody has been able to throw any light on the subject. The prevailing impression among politicians is that so far as Mr. Stanton is concerned there isn't any sentiment accessible to scrutiny. In the rush and bustle of affairs in this city the ex-Speaker who became famous as a result of his receiving from Washington a secret of prodigious importance with reference to a crisis in our relations with Japan, has been entirely forgotten. How treacherous is the memory of the people! But Phil Stanton need not pine or sulk in obscurity. One of the strong champions of direct nominations he may now proceed to mount this ladder jobward. A great moral principle he helped to prevail; now let him invite the material profits to materialize and thus ascertain whether the people feel a personal need for the services of a man who has done a lot of thinking for his country, and the fruits of whose mental processes ought to be advertised.

The Stephens History

After all, that monumental work, "The History of the San Francisco Fire and Earthquake," to which I alluded a week ago, is not such stuff as dreams are made of. It is a substantial reality—in the making. That it is not already between book covers is not entirely due to the temperamental dilatoriness of Professor Henry Morse Stephens, a gentleman who is inclined to prorogue his work of today till tomorrow and his tomorrows to eternity. Professor Stephens is not in robust health, and to that circumstance, in a measure, must be attributed the repeated demands that have been made upon the patience of those that have been looking forward nearly four years to the pleasure of reading the story of San Francisco's tremendous tragedy and marvelous rehabilitation. It must not be supposed that Professor Stephens has failed to find adequate inspiration in the theme. The circumstance that he neglects to execute literary plans formed in the white heat of a young enthusiasm is no indication that his muse is languishing from inanition. Long ago he finished two volumes of his history of the French Revolution, but there is no immediate prospect of the completion of that great work. Now it is certainly not to be supposed that the thrilling drama of the downfall of the Bourbons is at any stage lacking in inspiring episode. No; this is merely a case of the author taking a siesta between chapters.

History of the History

It was President Taft, I am told, who first suggested the writing of the history of our calamity. The relief work having been directed by the War Department of which he was Secretary, he thought that a record of what had been done should be published so that it might be available in any similar emergency that might arise. After some discussion of the matter by the local relief committee it was decided to have a history written, and Professor Henry Morse Stephens was consulted. He immediately overflowed with enthusiasm. Nothing would give him greater pleasure than to become the author of a work so important to mankind and so rich in all the elements that appeal to human interest. A committee consisting of John Drum, Clement Bennett and Edward Moran was appointed to gather official and all other kinds of data. These gentlemen labored industriously for months in piling up material, and they supplied Professor Stephens with a cartload, all systematically tabulated with a view to minimizing research. It was all stowed away in Professor Stephens' bachelor apartments in the University Club at Berkeley and there it is slowly becoming matured. But let it not be supposed that Professor Stephens has entirely neglected the promised work. He is now in Europe trying to recover his health, but before he went abroad he delivered a series of lectures in Boston on the subject which is to be embodied in his history for the enlightenment of posterity. These lectures were taken down in shorthand and they are to be handed over to two of his disciples who will proceed at once to make a history out of them. Of course when Professor Stephens returns he will supervise the work and direct the plan of construction. In other words he will collaborate with his disciples.

Legislators in the Sheriff's Office

Sheriff-elect Tom Finn seems to be duly impressed with the importance of having law-makers on his staff. Having served one term in the State Senate Finn probably appreciates the value of the services, political as well as shrieval, which he may expect from men who have had a Sacramento session or so to their credit. His chief jailer is Walter Macauley, republican and union labor assemblyman from the twenty-eighth district; his jail commissary is John A. Cullen, ditto from the twenty-ninth; one of his bailiffs is James Hopkins, democratic and union labor assemblyman from the thirty-first. Another bailiff is Sam Kohlmann, a former republican assemblyman from the forty-second. With three, and possibly four, assemblymen on his payroll—for all are likely to be candidates for re-election—Tom Finn should have no difficulty in getting his senate bills considered in the lower house.

Boohoo! Henry threw one of my biscuits at me.

The Examiner Scores on the Call

I am surprised to find that the Examiner has reserved the right to reproduce the African hunting cartoons of John T. McCutcheon, the well-known Chicago humorist. My surprise arises from the fact that the McCutcheon cartoons will be published in the Chicago Tribune with which the Call holds syndicate connections. The national convention articles of the late Raymond Patterson, Frederick Palmer's Central American series and the recent letters on Ireland were among the matter which the Call purchased from the Tribune for western publication. And now the Examiner has been allowed to secure McCutcheon's services by arrangement with the Chicago Tribune people. As McCutcheon is the funniest newspaper artist in the country and a good humorist in prose as well, his work will be eagerly sought; so I am unable to imagine any reason why the Call overlooked the opportunity of republishing it. Perhaps the Examiner bid higher.

by seventy-five members of the club last Wednesday night to John P. Wilson. "Jack" Wilson is one of the most popular men in the newspaper club and his fine talent for lyric writing with his ever ready wit and his exuberance of genial spirit have distinguished many a high and low jinks and endeared him to a big circle of appreciative friends. It was "Jack" Wilson who wrote the celebrated "Ode to Tombstone III' which embalms the attributes and eccentricities of the club cat and which, sung to Fletcher Tilton's music one ladies' night, created a sensation which will not be soon forgotten. Wilson's pen has ever been ready in the service of the club, his stories are classics and his manipulation of a hand at poker or bridge has made him the envy of innumerable newsgatherers. Wilson has written a great deal for the stage, both in this city and New York. Some of his best pieces were produced at the Tivoli in the palmiest days of Eddy street; and two of his musical comedies are still drawing throughout the country. He has recently received commissions for musical comedies which may necessitate his departure from San Francisco for a prolonged stay; so it was no more than fitting that the good fellows of the club should tender him a dinner.

Talk About the Gridiron!

Here is where the Gridiron comparison comes in. There is an affectation of cynicism about newspapermen which forbids their parading deep affection. Hence their feelings of a tender nature are usually to be measured in terms of jocular and good natured "roasting." Wilson was "roasted to a turn" by the speechmakers at the dinner and the work was done with such delicious humor that the table was kept in a roar. "Billy" Barnes was toastmaster and among the speakers were General Tirey Ford, General "Jim" Smith, Grant Carpenter and Al Dobson. All are adepts at after-dinner speaking and when they had finished with "Jack," a newspaperman who had attended several Gridiron Dinners remarked to me: "I never heard so much spontaneous wit and such good humor in my life. The 'pannings' of the Gridironers are nothing to this." Grant Carpenter was particularly felicitous in his biographical sketch of Wilson's career which teemed with mirth-provoking incidents. When the "roasting" had been completed Captain Barnes presented Wilson with a drawing in commemoration of the affair made by Haig Patigian and in his little presentation speech there was shown, this time in words of direct and serious frankness, such a depth of affection and such hearty well-wishing that Wilson was hard put to it to make fitting acknowledgment without displaying too much feeling. The affair was voted by experts the most successful held in the club since the newspapermen left their earthquake headquarters in the Withrow home in Pine street.

Lord Curzon's Romances

The rumor of a forthcoming alliance between Lord Curzon and the lately divorced Mrs. John Jacob Astor may not be based in fact but it serves to remind me that this peer has had an unusually romantic career. The heart interest has never been long absent from his active life. Everybody remembers how Lord Curzon captured the lovely Mary Leiter, the daughter of an American multimillionaire. International marriages that brought American millions to gild the coronets of peers were not so frequent in those days and Mary Leiter came in for a remarkable amount of attention on both sides of the Atlantic. It is not so well known, however, that previous to his meeting Mary Leiter, Lord Curzon was much smitten with Mrs. Pearl Craigie, who used the pseudonym of John Oliver Hobbes in publishing a series of richly epigrammatic and cleverly constructed stories. Mrs. Craigie had made an unfortunate marriage which was rapidly followed by divorce and just before Lord Curzon first met Mary Leiter he was so much in the society of the gifted writer that all London confidently looked forward to their marriage. From her father who was a patent medicine manufacturer in Boston Mrs.

Craigie had inherited considerable wealth and did a great deal of entertaining, not only in London but also in her beautiful place on the Isle of Wight. Lord Curzon was rarely missing from her brilliant gatherings. But Lord Curzon was very ambitious and lacking a large income, he could not have achieved his hopes of high political preferment with Mrs. Craigie's dowry. When he met Mary Leiter a sincere heart attachment went hand in hand with the calculations of interest and Mrs. Craigie was forgotten. George Moore would have comforted her in her sorrow if Mrs. Craigie had seen fit to smile upon his suit, but she never married again. She died about three years ago under peculiar conditions which convinced many that she had committed suicide. About the same time Lady Curzon whose money enabled her husband to become viceroy of India, also died but none of her millions went to the widower. And once more Lord Curzon, it is rumored, will make a match which will bring him more ready money.

Mrs. Eddy's Latest Words

Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy, the high priestess of Christian Science, has just recalled herself to the public attention which she usually shuns, by two lucubrations of widely different character. One of these was a terse note addressed to a Christian Science leader who was in doubt as to the fees which "Scientists" should charge for their ministrations. Mrs. Eddy laid down the rule that the fees should be the same as those charged by reputable physicians. There is a vagueness about this rule which is not unusual in Mrs. Eddy's messages to the world. But it also raises a curious problem which has been called to my attention by a correspondent. How can physicians who apply medicine and surgery to the healing of ills be reputable physicians in the eyes of Christian Science? As disease, in that cult, my correspondent argues, is a thing of no physical existence but merely a mental condition, the physician who uses physical remedies cannot be reputable; he must be a quack obtaining money under false pretenses. How does Mrs. Eddy reconcile her utterance with her teachings? I do not profess to be able to answer my correspondent's question. Mrs. Eddy's other lucubration exhibits her in the new role of a versified. Here is the music Mrs. Eddy sings: "O blessings infinite, O glad new year; sweet sign and substance of God's presence here. Give us not only angels' songs, but science vast to which belongs the tongue of angels and the song of songs." Christians have been chary about accepting Mrs. Eddy as a Christian, scientists have been equally unwilling to acclaim her a scientist and I do not think that the poets will be enthusiastic in praise of her rhymes.

A Very Wise Chinese

It was my good fortune the other day to run across a story which indicates that David Starr Jordan is not taken seriously by everybody in the classic shades of Palo Alto. At least one man in that neck of the woods seems to be "on" to the prexy. The fact that this man is a Chinese is only another proof of the depth of oriental discernment. The fact that he is a cook adds flavor to the yarn which was told by Dr. Devine who will be remembered as one of our most statistical relief workers. It is related, says Dr. Devine, that in Palo Alto at noon on April 18, 1906, a Chinese cook was preparing dinner in the street on an improvised cook stove of bricks. A passerby remonstrated that this was useless labor, that there was to be another earthquake before the dinner could be eaten. The Chinaman evinced little interest, but inquired: "Who say so?" "Why," was the answer, "Dr. Jordan says so." John Chinaman merely remarked, "Why didn't Dr. Jordan tell us about the first one?" and went on with his cooking.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—While there was much cleaning up of speculative accounts, over the first of the year, in which some liquidation occurred, the general trend of values in leading stocks was upward, Southern Pacific, Chesapeake and Ohio and Atchison being features. Rhode Island also made a strong recovery. The character of buying in these stocks was good and gives promise of even a better market the coming week. The Southern Pacific, Pennsylvania and Chesapeake and Ohio dividends will be increased early in the coming year and we may look for other events of this kind in other stocks. Conditions remain distinctly bullish.

Wheat—The market has been rather irregular and not large, with strength showing early and easiness later. Trade in December delivery was in small lots exclusively and the aggregate of these made a modest total. Argentine news was rather sensational; the government figures giving color to the recent pessimistic estimates of available export surplus. The government puts the latter at the same figure as last year which is 96,000,000 bushels for the year now closing against 139,000,000 bushels from the previous year's crop, which was estimated at 192,000,000. The 1909-10 crop is estimated at 157,000,000 bushels against 161,000,000 bushels raised for 1908-09 from which the 96,000,000 bushels have just been cleared. Foreign markets held firmly. The trade is anticipating larger receipts with the return of milder weather and the gradual improvement in the railway situation in the northwest.

Corn—The corn market has been quiet and dull all week. The net loss has not been large as pressure has not been very aggressive and there has been a little quiet commission house absorption on declines that has taken more or less property. Leading shorts in May have sold both December and May. The cash demand is slow. Milder weather prevails in all parts of the corn belt and is expected to start a great deal of corn this way.

Cotton—The keen demand for spots during the past few days was world-wide and reached every primary supply market in the south. Japanese were reported buying up all offerings in Oklahoma and in parts of Texas and Arkansas. This, coming on the heels of advices showing that the Far Eastern requirement was so great as to check European imports of East Indian cotton, robbed Caucasian consumers of their last hope. The old year closes with the cotton market generally in a healthier condition than has been the case in many a day. Consumers see forced idleness ahead of them because of inability to secure supplies, consequently many of them are providing themselves with cotton whenever and wherever cotton can be purchased. The December report of the cotton yarn exchange contained a warning that no relief was in sight for the spinners until new crops were made. There are legitimate reasons for the advance to this point, and there are appearing daily reasons for an advance to twenty cents. Many dreamers are waiting for the inevitable crash, as if this was a wild and woolly advance without anything back of it but speculation. There will come a break some day if the next crop promises to be fourteen and one-half millions or more, but it will come from some price above twenty cents and it will not go much, if any, lower than prevailing prices. For not only will cotton be scarce for some time, but there is going to be a famine of cotton goods. We will never overtake the world's consumption of cotton except at prices so high as to seriously curtail consumption, and clothes made of thirty cent cotton will still be the cheapest clothes in the world, and the world is not going naked. If the spinners had bulled their products instead of sending out so many bad trade reports in the hope of getting cotton down, goods would be selling today on the basis of twenty cent cotton. We are this high to stay and I never expect to see eleven cent cotton again, or three and one-half cent print cloth. October is the time the mills load up, and, with a famine likely to prevail before the new crop is in hand, houses with mill clients are taking on a fair share of the October option. Hence the advance in this option to fourteen cents.

Cotton—While the railroad and general industrial list has offered few features of interest, the Boston market for copper stocks has been one to delight the heart of the nimble speculator. There was a weakness in North Butte and Parrott and, distressing as it must be to the holders of these very good stocks, we think it will prove a blessing in disguise as it will put a curb on the tendency to overdo speculation. As we have previously expressed ourselves, our bullish ideas on the copper market are being fulfilled, particularly in regard to such stocks as Chino, Ray Consolidated, Miami, Cactus, Osceola and Inspiration. This last stock we have very good news on. Inspiration which is in the Miami District in Arizona, is considered by the mining engineers equal to the average mine in the vicinity. They are getting out 2 to 2¼ per cent ore and there is a large body of it. This we get from the best authority. There are 100 men working on the property and the management is very well spoken of. The New Baltic Company is making good progress and the sinking of a permanent shaft for this mine will soon be in order. The sinking of a shaft outside of the lode is now the approved practice in Michigan as it permits the companies in mining to draw down the whole lode without leaving any pillars. It is interesting in this connection to note that the Lake Copper Company (so we have been given to understand) has spent to date $150,000; consequently the funds provided at the organization of the New Baltic should carry it a long way. Copper mining is one of the most important industries in this country. The amount of money invested in its exploitation is exceeded by few other lines of production and the value of the product is exceeded only by the value of iron and oil produced. The production of copper for 1909 was 1,410,000,000 pounds which was approximately 272,000,000 pounds more than in 1908. Our exports were 690,000,000 pounds or about 30,000,000 more than last year. Even this large production of copper will hardly suffice for the growing requirements of the country. The Osceola has been strong in anticipation of the 6 per cent dividend just declared. It was practically assured that the company would pay $6.00. Should the price of copper metal advance to fourteen cents as it should in a very short while its earnings would be large enough to pay $8.00, six months from now, and we may confidently look forward to better prices for all the high grade copper stocks, for it is the purpose of the people interested in the merger to increase the production by creating a bigger demand, in exploiting greater uses to which copper may be put and at the same time reducing the cost of production.

Local Securities—The only incident of note that happened in the local security market during the period between Christmas and New Year and the few days following, OUTSIDE OF THE MERE FACT THAT TWENTY OF THE LEADING CALIFORNIA STOCKS SHOWED A GAIN OF OVER FORTY PER CENT FOR THE YEAR 1909, was the sharp drop in the price of Spring Valley Water stock and bonds which occurred on Monday last. The immediate cause of this slump was the speech made by Mayor-elect P. H. McCarthy in which he advised all union men to vote against the purchase of the Spring Valley plant by the city of San Francisco for $35,000,000 or in fact for any price. As the recent advance in Spring Valley was based altogether on the idea that the chances for the city to buy the plant were bright, it is no wonder that Mr. McCarthy's speech, taken with the power of the union labor vote, should cause much damage to the price of the stock. So far Spring Valley shares have declined about 10 points and the bonds about 4 points and at the present writing it is hard to surmise whether a further break or a recovery is to come. The balance of the listed stocks have been rather steady. Associated Oil has lately showed a strong undertone on good buying from Los Angeles and New York. Alaska Packers has been irregular without much fluctuation. Bond trade has been rather small as is generally the case at this time of the year, a great number of the regularly listed issues now selling ex-coupon. In the best informed circles it is said that Associated Oil, Alaska Packers and Pacific Gas and Electric, common and preferred, will be the January features, as regards advances, in the local market.

Milo

Do you know what Quality means in a Turkish Cigarette? If not get a box of "MILO." Then, any other cigarette, and try same, side by side. You'll note the delicate, aromatic mildness of the "MILO." Mildness (yet with the richness in flavor) is what costs in Turkish Tobacco, and its just this that makes the Perfect Cigarette. You'll find it in No Other.

This perfection is obtained only by owning our own plantation in Turkey—the careful watchfulness from the seeding to the finished article.

Confirmation Strong

Rumors that another member of the De Young family is drifting altarward have been whispered of late in the haunts of the fashionable herd. This time it is Charles De Young, the energetic and popular young business manager of the Chronicle, to whom is imputed a disposition to yield to sentimental passion. Vivid color was given to these amiable rumors exactly on the stroke of twelve that proclaimed the birth of the new year. At that hour Mr. De Young bestowed upon the beautiful young lady who is believed to be the object of his sentimental esteem, a chaste tribute of affection—a kiss.

Princess David's Distinction

Princess David Kawananakoa who has been an interesting addition to society this winter is mother to the heir-apparent of the Hawaiian throne. It is a picturesque distinction. The young Prince Kalakaua is son of the late King Kalakaua's nephew and adopted son, David Kawananakoa whose death occurred three years ago. Prince Kalakaua and his sister, Princess Lilioukalani, are familiar figures in the neighborhood of Presidio Terrace where they disport themselves quite as other children. They are to attend school in this city and the heir-apparent will enter Yale ten years or so hence. Princess David's mother, now deceased, was a native woman and a great belle. She was twice married. The princess' father was the late James Campbell of Honolulu who made a fortune in sugar. Mrs. Campbell divorced him a few years before his death to marry Col. Sam Parker who is now accompanying ex-queen Lilioukalani on her annual pilgrimage to Congress. The second marriage took place nine years ago at the old Occidental Hotel in this city, just three days after Miss Campbell became Princess Kawananakoa, and there was a double honeymoon. Princess David is a beauty of the Carmen type, more Spanish than Hawaiian in appearance. She wears black velvet a great deal and had the honor of supporting the largest hat at Mrs. Porter Pfingst's recent luncheon at the Palace.

Death of D. O. Mills

A large family connection is thrown into mouring by the death of D. O. Mills, including Mr. and Mrs. Whitelaw Reid and their daughter, Mrs. Ward of London, and the Ogden Mills', one of whose daughters is Lady Grannard of Forbes Castle, Ireland. D. O. Mills was the great-uncle of Miss Jennie Crocker, and of Templeton Crocker, who was named for his wife, Jane Templeton Mills. Mrs. Easton, the grandmother of the Crocker children who has made her home with them since the death of their mother is a sister of the dead millionaire.

one of the wonders of the peninsula. There was not so much luxury in the homes of the wealthy in those simpler days and when it was learned that D. O. Mills had bedroom chairs of gilt and sky-blue satin the news created a great sensation. Of those chairs, by the way, an amusing story is told. When the Duke of Manchester, the grandfather of the present holder of the title, was out here many years ago he was entertained by Mills at the Millbrae seat. He was given an apartment for the night that was probably a little more glitteringly luxurious than any of the others. Next morning when asked by his host how he had enjoyed his slumber, the duke replied: "To tell you the truth, my dear fellow, your furniture was so awfully fine that I had no end of a time finding a place for my old clothes. I actually feared that I would soil the satin of your chairs with them." As the duke showed a very ancient and slovenly make-up during his visit here there was more truth than poetry in the compliment. The Mills place is one of the finest in San Mateo and boasts grounds that the care of many years has made unusually beautiful. D. O. Mills rarely stayed there more than six weeks in a year. He would come to the West ostensibly to rest, but in reality he spent little time in idleness. He took the train to the city every morning like an ordinary business clerk and returned at five o'clock in the evening. The annual visit was always the occasion of much quiet entertaining.

The Punch Is Getting Too Strong

There has been a great deal of criticism from the more staid members of society recently about the strong punch which is served at dances and other functions. So far from being discouraged from indulging themselves, the younger belles and beaux at certain dances have been urged to partake and the consequences in several instances have been lamentable. Hostesses seem to have a mania for making their punch a little stronger at each successive affair of the season and even experienced drinkers of the masculine contingent in society have been surprised at the amount of liquor used in some of the recent brews set out for old and young alike. I have in mind a recent dance (and it is only one of several such occurrences) at which the punch was so strong that some of the youngsters had to be forbidden to partake of it. Isn't it time to call a halt?

The Kelly-Palmer Engagement

At an informal but daintily appointed tea on Christmas day pretty Renee Kelly, who is the eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Roberts Kelly, announced her engagement to Edward Alexander Palmer, son of Warren Palmer, President of the Northwestern Pacific Railroad and prominent in railroad circles. Miss Kelly is a stunning looking girl with blonde hair and expressive eyes. She is a graduate of the Ursuline Convent at Santa Rosa. Her father belongs to one of the oldest and most prominent families here. Her grandfather is James R. Kelly, President of the Hibernia Bank. Her mother's family is equally prominent in the north. Mrs. Kelly was formerly Fannie Raleigh, daughter of Patrick Raleigh of Portland, Oregon. The prospective groom is a graduate of the University of California and is superintendent of the division between Weed and Klamath Falls, Oregon. Although the engagement has just been made public all the friends of the young couple have suspected their secret for some time. The wedding will take place in June. Their future home will be Oregon. Mrs. John G. Ewing, formerly Miss Ethel Kelly, sister of the prospective bride, will come to San Francisco in a few months on a visit to her parents. Mr. and Mrs. Ewing are at

"Reggie" Nicholson's Promotion

Friends of "Reggie" Nicholson in the Bohemia Club have been sending congratulations to the popular navy officer in Washington where he has just been made Chief of the Bureau of Navigation under Secretary Meyer, with the rank of Rear-Admiral. His duties will be to "advise the Secretary of the Navy" on a variety of matters, and "to issue, record and enforce the orders" of the department; so the appointment carries responsibility and power as well as honor. Reggie Nicholson who is remembered particularly as navigating officer of the "Oregon" on her famous voyage around the Horn is one of the well known members of the Bohemian Club where, during his long service in Pacific waters, he was a frequent visitor. He married a San Francisco girl, Miss Bessie Code.

Death of Mrs. Whitman

The death of Mrs. Malcolm Whitman occurred in New York last week, following the birth of a son. Mrs. Whitman was one of the five McCook girls, nieces of Charles B. Alexander whose wife was Hattie Crocker. Their father, General McCook, was at one time Minister to the Court of Kalakaoua and the hospitality of their Hawaiian home was famed. In early days General McCook was an Indian fighter. One of the McCook girls married Junius Morgan, nephew of J. Pierpont Morgan. Mrs. Alexander was a fairy god-mother to her nieces and the death of Mrs. Whitman, following closely that of George Crocker has been a severe blow to her.

New Year's Party at Pebble Beach Lodge

The gaieties of the holiday season at Hotel Del Monte were brought to a fitting climax with the unique and delightful old fashioned party at Pebble Beach Lodge on New Year's Eve. On that night the far famed Seventeen Mile Drive took on the appearance of the great Highway with its flashing automobiles hurrying back and forth. The guests came from Hotel Del Monte in automobiles especially provided for the occasion by Manager Warner, from Monterey and Pacific Grove in autos and carriages, and from the presidio on horseback, in automobiles and the usual "transportation" furnished by the quartermaster's department, that is to say, army wagons and mules. At the Lodge the great logs heaped in the capacious fireplaces burned with a ruddy glare bright enough almost to light the great hall. The fun commenced with the arrival of the first guests and continued until the early morning hours. Although there was no set program for the evening, several unique features were introduced, among them the singing of carols by the vested choir of St. John's Epispocal Church of Pacific Grove. A great popper filled with popping corn was kept busy at each fireplace and there were bowls of nuts and baskets of apples within reach of everyone. Sweet cider and old fashioned applejack gladdened the hearts of the merry-makers. Supper was served in the grill room and when midnight came, the bells rang and the New Year was greeted with glad shouts. Then for one brief minute the lights winked out and on again. This was the first New Year ever celebrated at Pebble Beach Lodge and the affair proved emphatically what a delightful place it is for such festivities.

A Concert of American Composers

The first concert of the San Francisco Center of the American Music Society was given at the First Congregational Church, Post and Mason streets, on Friday evening. The object of this local society which has its counterpart in New York in the society over which Walter Damrosch presides, is to give music lovers an opportunity to familiarize themselves with the works of American composers. Some of the splendid compositions which have been written in the United States have been sadly neglected by our musicians and it is the intention of the society to do all in its power to remedy this state of affairs. The program for the first concert was a most interesting one. There was a quintet for strings and piano by George W. Chadwick, songs by Arthur Foote, Edward A. McDowell, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and several others. The following are the trustees and the board of musical directors of the society: Trustees, W. J. McCoy, President; J. B. Levison, Vice-President; Rita Slater, Secretary; J. De P. Teller, Treasurer; E. M. Hecht, Librarian; J. D. Redding, John Galen Howard, Dr. H. J. Stewart and Dr. Louis Lisser. Board of Musical Directors: Frederick Zech, Wallace A. Sabin,

An Interpretation of Elektra

Miss Margaret Kemble will give the first of a series of four interpretative studies in modern opera at the St. Francis Hotel on next Monday at three o'clock. Richard Strauss' much discussed opera Elektra will be the subject of this first illustrative recital. Miss Kemble will be remembered for the illuminating interpretation of Debussy's Pelleas et Melisande which she gave at the St. Francis last February. Since that time she has been abroad collecting material for more analytical lectures on modern music-drama. She spent most of her time in London, Paris and Berlin and attended the Wagner season at Bayreuth. She enjoyed unusual advantages in all these art centers, conferring with composers, conductors and critics on the meaning and proper production of the works which she will interpret. The Elektra will be given in this city for the first time, almost simultaneously with its first production in New York. Its first production in Dresden last year was a continental sensation. Schumann-Heink was the first Clytemnestra and although she has vowed that she will never essay the role again, there are many glorious contraltos who are studying it now. Probably Marie Gartner who sang the role of Elektra in Berlin has had the most conspicous success with it. According to Miss Kemble this artist is "the very personification of the Nietzschean philosophy. She represents the triumph of the young and the new, the joy and light of life and the Superman." The opera study is a new thing here, although it is firmly established in the affections of music lovers in Europe and the Eastern musical centers. Miss Kemble is deserving of great praise for placing new works within the reach of students. In February, March and April Miss Kemble will interpret Paul Dukas' Ariane et Barbe Bleue, Strauss' Salome and Frederick Converse's The Pipe of Desire.

Inimitable Alice Lloyd

By Edward F. O'Day

It is not too much to say that Alice Lloyd has brought to the Orpheum the atmosphere of the London music halls. If anyone thinks that this is a small achievement let him send back his thoughts for a moment to those gorgeous places of entertainment in Leicester Square and Oxford Circus and Shaftesbury Avenue and remember how imagination, in the spell of their glittering amusements, refused to picture anything in vaudeville which could be quite as satisfying and delicious. Is it not remarkable for a woman to bring all that to the rim of this western world? I do not mean that Miss Lloyd brings all the atmosphere of the music halls with her; no individual could do that. Even Adeline Genee could scarcely accomplish so much if she transported to San Francisco one of those amazing pantomimes that are as full of wonders as Aladdin's palace. And then too there are things about the London music halls which we do not wish Miss Lloyd to bring to San Francisco. We do not care to pay ten shillings for a seat and sixpence for checking coat and hat on a rainy night and sixpence again for the privilege of inspecting a program. We do not want that amazing promenade of fair but frail women through the lobbies which the London managers are both unwilling and unable to stop. We do not care for the vile cocktails which they mix at the American bar. Perhaps some of us would modestly object to the extremely low bodices of the ladies who saunter in at ten o'clock or so and distract our attention from the stage with their frank display of charms; and would find fault with their escorts who have dined not wisely but too well. Of course these are all parts of the atmosphere of the London music halls, but they are not nearly as important a part as Miss Lloyd. Miss Lloyd is the superlative "bill-topper" of the music halls. She has voice and grace and magnetism and refinement. Do not overlook that element, refinement. She is no end clawsy, y' know, as a Londoner probably would not say. We have had many opportunities at the Orpheum to hear the language of the costers but never before, in my recollection, has it been sung or spoken with the delicacy which Miss Lloyd imparts. Delicacy may seem an undesirable quality in connection with coster songs and cockney speech, but it is just the quality which makes for Alice Lloyd's wonderful success. I do not mean the sort of delicacy which made Miss Ida O'Day's bit of street characterization a sweet failure; but the sort of delicacy which robs the London 'Arriet of her forbidding exclusiveness and makes her a creature of general interest. You or I could hardly pierce to the heart of Whitechapel or, let us say, Soho, if there were not Sally Snapes there—creatures who transcend environment and on whom the crudities of their position have made no impression. When Alice Lloyd sings the "bloke" or the "splash" song we are not repelled but attracted. One need not feel the poet's kindliness for all things human to be sympathetic. Not that Miss Lloyd could not repel us if she cared to; she knows her medium thoroughly, but she also knows what American managers want. Those little archings of the brows and tossings of the head and oglings and shruggings of the shoulder might be made naughty, the songs might be made a bit risque if the public and the managers wanted that. In London they do, just a little; probably because they demand more verisimilitude, more adherence to the general type. But Miss Lloyd is an artist of high power and she knows many types. She gives us the best, perhaps. From time to time the Orpheum management has imported for local delectation some of the finest of the London music hall entertainers but it has never done us a greater service of that kind than during the past two weeks. An opportunity to enjoy an inimitable artist is rare and we have just had it. For the opportunity all thanks. The management can hardly do us as great a service until it allows us to hear the inimitable Vesta Tilley. Alice Lloyd and Vesta Tilley deserve to be spoken of together. We have had a two-weeks' acquaintance with one; by all means let us hear the other. Will the Orpheum management hearken to the humble but sincere prayer of an old and confirmed Orpheumite?

New Columbia Opens Monday Night

Gottlob, Marx and Company will inaugurate the career of their new and magnificent playhouse, the Columbia, on Monday night and a brilliant gathering of representative playgoers will be in attendance to greet William H. Crane and his company in George Ade's comedy "Father and the Boys." The Columbia Theatre is said to be the most beautiful theatre ever constructed in the West and marks an important advance in the rehabilitation of the city. The structure stands at the corner of Geary and Mason streets, a location with many advantages. Wm. H. Crane, presented by Charles Frohman, will begin a two weeks' engagement on Monday evening. The comedy to be presented is said to be the best ever written by Ade, surpassing even "The College Widow" and "The County Chairman." If so, it must be great. For four months Crane appeared in it to crowded houses in New York and the original production will be seen here. Margaret Dale is leading woman and others well known in the cast are Louis Massen, Percy Brooke, Adele Clarke, Elsa Payne, Mildred Beverly, Vivian Martin, Forrest Orr, Sidney Blair and John P. Brawn.

Harry Lauder Approaches

The announcement that Harry Lauder, the celebrated Scotch comedian and entertainer, will appear for six nights and five matinees in this city at Dreamland Rink, starting next Monday evening, January 10, has created more interest than any other amusement event since the fire, and since Monday morning, when the seats were first placed on sale there has been an unbroken line of admirers of the wonderful little Scotchman who were anxious to secure choice locations for one or more of his entertainments. His entire tour across the continent has been a series of ovations and it was a lucky thing for San Francisco that as commodious an auditorium as Dreamland could be obtained. Mail orders have been pouring in from all parts of the State, applications having even been received from Reno. Lauder alone holds the audiences for over an hour and for the rest of the entertainment William Morris, Inc., under whose direction the tour is conducted, brings Julian Eltinge in his latest feminine characterizations, 'The Nell Brinkley Girl," "The Bathing Girl," "Eiley Riley" and his latest sensational dance, "The Cobra." Cyrano, the famous juggler, who has never appeared in this city, will perform some startling feats. Mlle. Berthe, a distinguished Hungarian violinist, will be heard in classical and popular selections and the Marimba Band, composed of native Guatemalan musicians, will discourse their quaint and charming music.

The Sembrich Concert

This Sunday afternoon the long awaited Sembrich concert will be given at the Garrick Theatre with the assistance of Francis Rogers, the eminent baritone, and Frank La Forge, the well known pianist. The diva will give one of the finest programs ever heard in this city, including operatic numbers, songs in German, French and English, and the great vocal waltz "Voce di Primavera" composed for Sembrich by Johann Strauss. A special feature will be two Mozart duets to be sung by the star and Mr. Rogers. On Thursday night an entirely different program will be offered, including some of the modern works of Debussy and Arensky. Sembrich's favorite aria "Ah! fors e lui" from La Traviata and the "Jewel Song" from "Faust" will be on the list. The farewell concert will be given on Sunday afternoon, January 16.

Olga Nethersole at the Van Ness

The coming engagement of Olga Nethersole, the distinguished English actress, at the Van Ness Theatre during the week of January 10 is an event of special interest inasmuch as it will disclose this eminent player in a role entirely different from anything she has heretofore essayed. "The Writing on the Wall" is press-agented as an epoch making play distinguished not only by its literary and dramatic qualities but also by the manner in which it assails the tenement house evil.

MRS. VOELKER

Who will be one of the Orpheum attractions next week

DR. MATILDA A. FEELEY

Is now located at 1700 Sutter Street. Diseases of women and children. Hours 2 to 4 and 7 to 8 p. m.

Magazine and editorial writers have eulogized it, ecclesiastical circles are said to have been aroused by the daring expose of a certain religious community and State officials to have become interested to such an extent that legislative measures were enacted to redress the evil. All of which is "going some," to drop into the vernacular. Miss Nethersole depicts the part of a devoted mother, loving wife and tenement reformer.

"The Wolf" at the Savoy

The last performances of "The Alaskan" will take place at the Savoy this Saturday afternoon and evening, and at the Sunday matinee one of the great big New York successes, "The Wolf," by Eugene Walter, author of "Paid in Full" and "The Easiest Way," will begin an engagement limited to one week. Andrew Robson who scored a success as Jules Beaubien when "The Wolf" was first seen in this city at the Van Ness Theatre, returns in the same role with a company of able players. The play has strong dramatic situations and its long run at the Lyric Theatre, New York, proves it to be an unusually interesting production. The usual matinees will be given Thursday and Saturday. "Brewster's Millions," that delightful comedy, will follow.

St. Elmo" at the Alcazar

"St. Elmo," the reigning dramatic sensation in the East, will be given its first presentation west of Chicago next Monday evening and throughout the week in the Alcazar. It was adapted by Willard Holcomb from Augustua J. Evans-Wilson's famous story, and is the only version authorized by the gifted novelist, about half-a-dozen piracies in as many different cities having been enjoined. Vaughan Glaser, Fay Courteney and a selected company are now playing in it to crowded houses in New York. While abounding in spontaneous comedy, the play rises to heights of dramatic intensity unsurpassed by any stage offering since "The Christian" was first launched. The third act climax ascends to a pitch of almost spiritual emotion in which mere physical love is subordinated to the higher moral law. All the scenes are laid in the South before the Civil War, which gives opportunity for a picturesque scenic investiture and quaintly effective costuming. In the cast will be composers. The Great Willy Pantzer troupe is sure of a cordial reception. Miss Una Clayton and her players, including Francis Morey, will appear in a one act sketch of human interest called "His Local Color," of which Miss Clayton is the authoress. She plays the character of an East Side New York waif "Tina" who is a pick-

Protean Artist at Orpheum

Arturo Bernardi, styled in Italy, "The Great Bernardi" who will make his first appearance in this city at the Orpheum next week is the most famous protean actor in Europe. He plays all the characters in two comedies, "The Escapade of Geralamo" and a skit entitled "The Surprise." In between he makes up as Wagner, Verdi, Meyerbeer, Sousa and other renowned pocket. Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Voelker will introduce their musical interlude "Twilight in the Studio."

"My Wife" at Ye Liberty

Commencing next Monday evening the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will offer "My Wife," the piece in which John Drew and Billie Burke appeared with such success the season before last. It has been selected by Manager Bishop as the medium in which to introduce Blanche Hall, the new leading lady of the company, and in Billie Burke's role of "Trixie" she certainly has a splendid opening part, and, if the Los Angeles critics are to be believed, a role for which she is exceptionally well suited.

GOOD SIGNS FOR SPRING

The Loose Sack Coat

The style tendency in sack coats for men will be toward shorter garments than have been in recent vogue, perhaps not more in length than 31½ inches. The general cut will show straighter, more conservative lines, and therefore will be less fitting than recent models. It will be on the order of the loose sack, and fall more direct from the shoulders than the shapely form-defining styles. The sleeves, also, will be fuller, and more of the elbow width throughout, with full sleeve-head. Lapels show less of the broad width of the recent past, and less length of roll, yet the fold will be long and narrow, with a somewhat rakish roll that will harmonize and balance with the fuller back, exaggerated chest and modified shoulder width, which will be slightly sloping, being defined as the natural shoulder in contrast with the Hercules type of the past. While this model represents a sudden return to conservatism in style, it is so abrupt a change from the recent extremes that it really becomes distinctive, and will portray for spring the extreme style in representative lines. It is a coat that will require good tailoring to bring out its merits. There will be little or no embellishments, and on some models the back vent will be eliminated, while others will have it.

A Shapelier Model

For men, also, there will be a more shapely sack coat, designed on shapelier lines, of about the same length, and being cut in at the waist will naturally flare moderately over the hips. With it there will be less plainly finished cuffs, and varying widths and lengths of the roll, the chief feature being an exaggerated chest fullness that, with the larger sleeves, will add dash enough for those who fancy a snappy garment.

Some Snap and Dash for Young Men

Young men's sack coats will differ in cut and be a trifle longer, on about a 32-inch grade, close fitting, flaring, but with less of the extreme hip of the present style, and modified front dip, with just enough snap in pockets and cuffs. The shoulders will be wider than the natural build, and with the exaggerated chest will give truer athletic proportions, since, with the modification of the hip flare it will give more of the real wedge-shape of the natural athlete, whose shoulders are broader than his hips, showing a reduction of that pronounced hip flare, which in recent styles has given men the appearance of having pelvic sizes natural only to their sisters.

In the young men's coats there will be lapels of different shapes, widths and lengths, and some fancy pocket and cuff effects, but none of the extremes, therefore less of the offensive freakish details that have now passed out of style.

Vests and Trousers

Vests will be cut about the same, with and without collars and lapels.

Trousers will be less peg-topped, and tending more to a conservative, straight and less full cut than before, and be worn turned up at the bottoms or plain.

A Winter Resort

Yosemite Valley is a winter resort. Do you get that? A winter resort where hundreds of delighted visitors are finding fun and recreation and health. A winter resort, remember, where artists and photographers are overwhelmed with "good material." A winter resort, put this down, which brings Canada to California, and brings to Californians the pleasures of sleighing, skating, tobogganing and the tramping or riding of snowy trails.

It is a veritable Fairyland. The waterfalls are falling as in summer, but their beauty is enhanced by the great icicles which hang from every ledge and peak and pinnacle. Frequently they break away in the warm sunlight, and striking a ledge of rock, are dashed into a cloud of diamond dust, while the echoes are caught up and repeated in a thousand tones by the great cliffs.

But the point for us all to remember here is that Yosemite, practically at our doors, is now open every day in the year; that it is a winter resort, and that at no time is it more beautiful than just now. And I know, for I have just come back.

You found it pretty cool in San Francisco the last few days. "The frost was on the punkin" and it seemed to get into your bones. And you shivered and growled at the weather clerk. You would not have done either if you had been in Yosemite with me. No one feels cold there. In the dry crisp exhilarating air and warm bright sunshine no one thinks of being cold. You join the laughing, shouting throng and in a trice you are snowballing the enemy, or you have snapped on the bright steel skates and are flashing up and down the smooth, clear ice pond.

And all this has been made possible by the building of the Hotel del Portal, at El Portal, the terminus of the Yosemite railroad. Here is a fine, large, modern building, fitted with every convenience, and even luxury, for over two hundred guests. There are big well-furnished rooms, porcelain baths, a finely equipped ladies' room and club room, an artistic lounging room, its great open hearth blazing with logs, and a dining room service which speaks loudly for Manager Babb's ability.

While it is not necessary to reserve accommodations in advance it is well to do so.

Yosemite is a winter resort and so is the Hotel del Portal. Which reminds one of the old darky who said,

THE ARTISTIC LOUNGING ROOM OF THE HOTEL DEL PORTAL

"Yes, suh, Caesar am very like Pompey, an' Pompey am very like Caesar, speshully Caesar." Is the Hotel del Portal a winter resort? Well I think that all who have been there this winter will agree, with the darky's emphasis, that it is.

One Thousand Two Hundred Men

"A damned way of amusing people! And that block-head can't even play properly. It's on our nerves he plays! Whoever can stand all those Andantes and Adagios, or whatever you call them?"

He stopped and poured the beer into our glasses. We nodded to one another and took a draught.

"It isn't that I don't like music," he continued—"there's a wonderful go in some sorts of music. The old Kamarainskaja, for instance, or some of the other dances, or a cake-walk like this one. . . ."

And he began to whistle an obsolete cake-walk, and rocked himself to and fro, gesticulating wildly.

"That's what I call music! What go! Not that stuff with tears and all earth's misery in it!"

"Did you have much music in Manchuria?" I asked.

"Music? You bet we did! As soon as we got there we began with that sentimental stuff about 'The girl I left behind me' and 'Old Folks at Home.' But it didn't last long."

"You took to playing livelier tunes?"

"Of course! Who could stand all that sentimentality in the long run? The new arrivals, who were still in their salad days, at once began to chirp trembling ditties, like little crickets, early and late; but they soon left off. . . . Some of them got on quite wonderfully well even with those instruments of primitive tribes."

I only looked at him questioningly. Evidently I had touched a subject that set him going. He seemed to have gulped down a couple of thousand years with two glasses of cognac. The instruments of the primitive people tore in his ears. . . .

"Yes, they fell upon everything that could produce a sound. We stole all sorts of tin and brass things which could be used for music. There was a great demand for corks and champagne bottles with a high note. Many of those that were broken in drinking had a high note. . . . A lad who came from the North had plenty of work in making horns—of the kind, you know, that cowherds use for calling their cattle. . . . Even those who possessed no natural ability whatever wanted to make music. . . . Finally, there were no keys left to our boxes and trunks. Quite unique it was when we gave a concert. The two best singers were incomparable. God rest their souls!"

And the doctor, quickly turning to the holy icon in one of the corners, crossed himself hurriedly. . . .

"They were incomparable when they sang to the accompaniment of the orchestra!

"One of them sang through his nose, the other trilled and rattled far down in his throat, squeezing it the while with both hands. They had learnt it when topographers on their journeys in Asia and Abyssinia.

"Babylon and the pyramids rose dewily out of their gurgling and snuffling. . . .

"If we possessed a whole drum one of the cleverest of the musicions would kick into it, while another would sprawl across it on his stomach and beat his fits into a samovar in front of him. . . .

"The only incurable one was a Finn. He stuck to his own ideas. There was no depth in him. You should have heard him play the violin. We did not listen much to him, though. He went his own way; but as an exception he was allowed to play in the orchestra; the sound of the violin was so faint that nobody could come to grief through it.

"One night, after an evening party at the mess, he was sent for from the barracks; a bandage had to be changed in his division.

"We all lay asleep amongst the instruments and empty bottles.

"When the messenger had shaken him awake an idea struck him. I suppose it was caused by the exhalations of the wounded, that odor of dissolution and decomposition, with its rank smell of newly-slaughtered flesh. Or perhaps it might have been the sudden sound of the screams and ceaseless groans which the nerves get gradually hardened to in the waking state, but which now came upon him unawares. At any rate, he sat up with a jerk, caught hold of his violin stealthily, and struck the messenger lustily on the head with it. It was never a violin again—after that.

"From that time forth he played the concertina. He became quite a virtuoso on that monster of a concertina, which he had got hold of at one of the traveling 'tingel-tangels,' and which fitted so well into its surroundings. . . . At Fortissimo it squealed like a creaked organ-pipe . . . and when he pulled it out as far as his arms would reach, and pushed it together again till his eyes were bloodshot, there was something quite solemn about it.

"He played himself completely crazy. If his old mother had seen him in that state . . . good God! But she never did see him again. He played something to pieces in himself when the twelve hundred wounded men froze to death—under our hands—after the affair of Sandepo. . . . And he could not have done better." . . .

I looked anxiously at the doctor. But no trace of irony or fact that the commander of the ambulance-division, which ought to have removed the wounded—Solnzew was his name—blew his brains out. It was just after Fedorow, colonel of the Guards, had sent in his report. He couldn't stand it, though he was a tough customer. Honor and conscience, you understand! And so the affair was hushed up. Altogether the soldier was not handled too tenderly up there. In no other war has the 'food for cannon' been treated with similar cynicism. There were surprisingly few ambulances. You ought to have seen the harvesting of the wounded after a bloody battle! They were collected in heaps, filled into railway-cars like so many logs of wood, and left there for days together."

The doctor covered his mouth with his hand and leant over towards me with an uncanny look, so uncanny that I too felt my face twitch.

"At Schache the dogs of the Chinese devoured the wounded who were left behind!" He seized my arm, and I saw cold drops of sweat upon his forehead.

"Holy Virgin! There the mangy curs of the Chinese devoured our wounded, and here they froze to death in the midst of us! What a day!

"Our men had taken one palisaded village after the other by storm. Every single outwork had to be carried at the point of the bayonet. The Japanese held on like limpets. We literally had to overthrow them one by one. It was the key to the enemy's position we were fighting for. Towards evening we were practically masters of it, when the commander-in-chief sounded the retreat. It had cost us 14,000 dead and wounded out of the 40,000 who had been under fire. . . . The generals were jealous of one another. . . . You remember the affair . . . 14,000 dead and wounded. We worked like madmen to get them away. There were two feet of snow and twenty-five degrees of frost. The trains went northward filled with dying, frozen men; but there were not even carriages enough for such butchery! . . .

"The wounded were dragged to the railway-line, where they had to await their turn, and wait long. For of course we collected from the side nearest to the main position.

"I was at that time stationed, together with the Finn, at one of the flying ambulances within the line of fire, so we remained at Sandepo and carried the wounded to the railway. A few of them had been temporarily bandaged; but all the less serious cases had to get on as best they might. Some had stripped cloaks and fur coats from the dead—they had no need of them now! Others lay immovable in the position in which they had gone down, waiting for us to come. But there were a great many who couldn't wait. When we took a moment's respite we suddenly caught sight of the snowfield. It resembled the face of a dead man covered with flies. Only that it wasn't silent like the dead. Shrieks and moans were heard as from a thousand women in labor. When the moon came out we had carried about 1,200 men to the railway-line. They were placed in rows in the snow, and we covered them up with everything we could take from the dead. But they wouldn't remain quiet. Some of those best able to move walked or stumbled about to begin with. Others crept along on their arms, dragging their feet after them. Even those who had been shot in the back or the abdomen found strange ways of pushing and sliding about.

"And those who could not move from the spot, but were still alive and conscious, turned their heads to and fro or drew their lips in and out to prevent the rime from their breath from congealing their faces.

"When one or the other got quite exhausted he only moved his eyes, till that, too, was beyond his power. The people at the ambulance were so worn out by this time as to be almost insensible to the suffering around them. Death went round unhindered on this horrible camping-ground and marked his own. As one by one he stamped them with his icy seal they became silent. But the others went on and on, moving in circles and broken lines. They continued to creep and crawl like bleeding snails on those fields of eternal ice. It was quite a relief to look at the immovable points in this crawling mass. . . .

"On the side the wind came from a sickening, raw smell lay like a clotted film over the senses. When it was not to be endured any longer I sent a man to beg for an ambulance train. I believe I sent a messenger every half hour; but none of them returned. And when we imagined that we heard an engine whistling in the distance the wounded ceased to creep and beg and implore for help. They fell into an immovable, strained silence, a silence so intense that you almost seemed to feel your heart burst, to hear the moonlight glide across the snow-covered fields and mingle with the feverish visions of the unconscious. They prayed, too, to God and man, and even to the devil himself, and some there were who cursed. . . .

"One tall soldier had got his face torn and one arm riven off by a shell. He walked and rested intermittently, now praying, now cursing. At last he lay down, and seemed to have grown calm. But after one of the pauses, during which we had been straining our ears to catch the slightest sound, he sprang up as though he had been struck where he lay. He opened and shut his mouth several times, grinding his teeth and trying in vain to produce a sound. Then, quite unexpectedly, there came a bellowing from deep down in his throat, something between a roar and a growl, followed by a furious volley of blasphemies and invocations to the Evil One.

"Then it was that the Finn began to play his concertina.

"He could stand it no longer. For each time we had listened in vain for the distant whistling he had lost more and more control of himself. He shook his head and grasped it with his hands as though to steady it. But then, as I said, he started playing. It could harm no one, rather the opposite. I believe many of them went mad before they froze to death only through hearing him play the accompaniment to the 'Mass' of the tall soldier.

"But he himself no longer saw or heard what went on around him. He put his whole soul into his music, becoming entirely absorbed in it with what was left in him of life. I have heard a good many kinds of music, but nothing like that. . . . And certainly never wish to. Not that he played badly. He was a master on the concertina.

"He played the 'Melancholy Serenade' in a duet with the one-armed soldier till even the desolate snowfield seemed to groan. He continued playing without noticing that the soldier fell down and remained where he was, never moving again. For many hours did he play during the long winter night, and only stopped for one short moment to throw off his fur coat. It was too hot for him. Then he continued playing in his shirt sleeves, unconscious of aught else.

"He did not notice that the concertina was played to pieces, and hissed but hoarsely. He did not see how the immovable spots in the crawling mass before him grew larger and larger, till they formed but one huge frozen spot in the snow. Nor did he feel that something in his own brain grew big and motionless, till the concertina fell out of his hands. He just got time to lift his arms, then fell forwards on his face, and remained lying thus . . . as though listening to some strange, unknown music in space. . . .

"Towards morning the train arrived."

. . . . At this moment the audience poured out of the theatre like a flock of wild beasts let loose.

The doctor looked at me in a confused and absent-minded way. He got up quietly, and with the same absent look:

"As I told you," he muttered, "there are no episodes." . . . And he vanished in the crowd.

Sanitary milk production was first started by Gail Borden in the early 50s. The best systems today are largely based on his methods, but none are so thorough and so rigidly enforced as the Borden system. For over fifty years the Eagle Brand Condensed Milk has proved its claim as the best food for infants.

Auto Notes

"That California is the third State when we consider the number of automobiles owned and driven is not a surprise to me," is the statement of Fred C. Hanford, a prominent attorney of New York. Mr. Hanford is quite an auto enthusiast, having owned several Thomas cars, and when in San Francisco he never fails to call upon the Pioneer Automobile Company. He is also very enthusiastic over California and the favorable conditions here for motoring. "Just think," said he, "you can go out for a pleasure ride on Christmas or New Years, an impossible thing in the East. Why, if I lived out here I would have a whole flock of autos."

Through their Petaluma agency, G. W. Rodehaver, the Howard Automobile Company has just delivered to Geo. Riley of that city a seven passenger fifty horsepower Buick touring car. Riley is an old and well known automobile man, who for several years has been connected with the sales organizations of various automobile agencies and who is held in high regard by all who know him as a recognized authority on automobiles.

"Speaking of mileage," said Chas. W. Sleeper recently, "three years ago I put a 30x3½ Diamond Tire on my Maxwell car and since that time have covered a distance of more than 30,000 miles on all kinds of roads. This is my testimony to the Diamond Tire."

The cup offered by the New Years celebration committee for the largest number of cars of any one make in the automobile parade, and won for the second consecutive time by the Buick with fifty-one cars in line, is an unusually large and beautiful trophy, standing twelve inches in height and upon a base six inches high. This most attractive cup, which is on display at the salesrooms of the Howard Automobile Company, is of bronze artistically decorated with grape vines and bunches of grapes, and is nine inches in diameter at the top and seven and one-half inches at the base.

"The present seems to be the lucky season for the Chalmers-Detroit Company," remarked W. C. Hood, the factory representative who is now on the coast. "It has been the custom of the Breslin Hotel, Broadway, New York, for the past few seasons—on account of the heavy patronage of the automobile manufacture—to donate space in the lobby for one machine to be shown during the period of the Licensed Automobile Show in New York. The management, after the different factories have engaged their apartments for headquarters, have a drawing to determine the lucky exhibitor. Carl Page & Company of New York, agents for the Chalmers-Detroit, drew the space for the coming show, and will exhibit one of the beautiful green thirty pony tonneaus. On account of the Breslin Hotel being so popular for automobile headquarters, this is almost as good as another show."

Among the many new purchasers of the Diamond Grip Tire this week are W. H. La Boyteaux and Hutchinson & Co.

Speaking of the new quarters into which his company has moved, D. W. James of the Pioneer Automobile Company said: "The larger store acts as a relief to the congested condition under which the company has been struggling for some time. By reason of increased sales in the last few years, the business has grown to such proportions that the old quarters were entirely too small, and it is certainly a relief to have elbow room and the opportunity to better display each individual car, thus enabling customers to draw comparisons between the different models. If the short time we have been here may be taken as an indication of what we may expect in the future, we have every reason to believe our business will be greatly increased."

Ira D. Lundy, Stoddard-Dayton agent for Seattle, has written The Diamond Rubber Company that he is particularly well pleased with the use of the new Diamond Grip Tires on his car. He writes that not only do they do away with tire chains, but that the tires are not so easily punctured and stand up much better under hard usage than any other type in a hilly city like Seattle.

Jas. E. Bayliss who has become connected with the Howard Automobile Company's selling force is one of the oldest and most experienced of the automobile contingent, having spent years in the business in the East. He dates back to the early steam days and has followed the business through its various stages, having represented various large factories both as traveling representative and as retail representative in the East and central West. He comes here from the Buick agency in Portland and will exert his energies on the Oldsmobile line.

That eastern people are beginning to appreciate the natural beauties of California for touring is more and more in evidence each day. W. J. O'Mara, general passenger agent of one of the eastern railways, wired E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Company recently, asking for full information regarding road conditions and the possibility of using an automobile through Yosemite Valley.

A very interesting letter has been received by The Diamond Rubber Company from D. E. Hughes of Seattle showing splendid service of Diamond Tires on his Franklin car. He writes that the front tires have already run 8,150 miles and look good for further service. One of the rear tires covered 7,600 miles before ever being removed from the rim, while the other rear is still on the wheel and looks good for several hundred miles more.

Among the recent deliveries of Buicks by the Howard Automobile Company is a forty roadster to Joseph Rose, for the past year connected with the Los Angeles branch of the Howard Automobile Company, but now of Warm Springs. Rose is an automobile man of wide experience and information and was guided in his own purchase by the higher regard in which he holds the Buick products, and his knowledge gained from his intimate association with these cars, of their superior qualities and great durability.

The Determining Cause of Genius

Stuart Mill, at the age of twelve, was so deeply affected by studying his father's History of India, that his genius and passion for historical and economic events began at that time.

Darwin, at eight, while he had already a great passion for collecting plants and animals, fancied, or rather, invented, and told to a schoolmate, the story that he could change the hue of flowers by sprinkling plants with colored solutions. It was a mere story, but it shows that from those early years he had observed the variability of plants. The germ of that idea, which was to dominate his whole life, was concealed in this puerile fiction that afterward became a reality. The great English naturalist believed that his having seen at that time an account of a journey around the world, which greatly interested him, caused him to long for trips to far countries, and to travel, in later days, on the Beagle.

Sir William Herschel was a player who had learned by himself languages and mathematics, without any special end in view. His having seen, at twenty-one, the field of the sky through a telescope, struck him so forcibly that he made a telescope himself.

Lalande, a pupil of the Jesuits, composed dramas and novels at the age of ten; later, he aimed to be an eloquent lawyer; but when an astronomer made him observe the great eclipse of 1748, he felt his passion for astronomy, and became an astronomer, too; he was sixteen years old at that time.

Boerhave was intended to be a clergyman, and he took his degree of divinity. The idea of curing an ulcer that vexed his hand, roused in him his first passion for medicine.

Lalande, Lagrange, Young, thought of themselves as classical, literary men, until either astronomical instruments or demonstrations in geometry came accidentally into their hands; and Gianni, a stays-maker, became a poet after reading Ariosto's poems.

To many a genius the first impulse has been given by feminine beauty. Petrarch, at the age of fourteen, was drawn to poetry and a life of genius by the first sight of Laura.

Dante declares in his writings that he was inspired by his meeting with Beatrice in his early youth.

Burns, a shepherd, who had been already inspired by his mother's folk-songs, wrote his first poem at fifteen, for love of a young girl.

Sometimes religious passion takes the place of erotic excitement. Lacordaire was roused by his first communion, and Rapisardi relates that, at thirteen, an ode to St. Agatha started the long series of his poems.

Do you know why they hung D'Auber's landscape so high?

Yes; because they couldn't catch D'Auber.

Old De Swelle—Yes, you may have my daughter; but before I can propose you at my club I must make some inquiries about you.

Wish I had an idea for a poem.
Why waste one on a poem?

Album Verse in Cipher

An ingenious poet wrote this in the album of a young lady:

"U o a o, but I o u;
O o no o, but O o me;
O let not my o a o go;
But give o o, I o u so!"

which, being deciphered, reads:

"You sigh for a cipher, but I sigh for you;
O sigh for no cipher, but O sigh for me;
O let not my sigh for a cipher go;
But give sigh for sigh for I sigh for you so!"

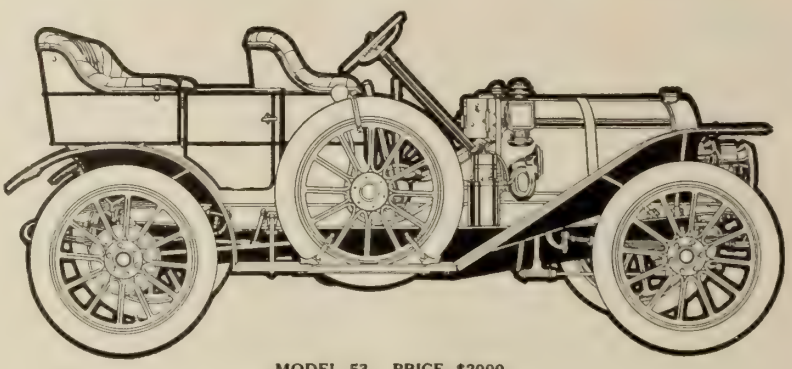
There are good reasons for the wonderful demand of

THE NEW Rambler

Greatest Value for the Money

Lowest Cost of Upkeep

The phenomenal results which owners of 1908 and 1909 Rambler cars have obtained has created a demand for our cars which is unprecedented in the automobile business.



MODEL 53. PRICE, $2000.

The elimination of corporation expense; adoption of a policy of permanent rather than temporary needs; personal supervision of methods, materials and work by Mr. Jeffery himself, and building all parts from the raw material, thereby cutting out the profits to parts makers, gives the buyers of THE NEW Rambler an automobile as good as can possibly be built at a price but little higher than that asked for cheap assembled cars.

H-O

Where's That Cook?

You are not dependent on the cook—you need not worry that breakfast will be late. if you have H-O oatmeal in the house. In fifteen minutes you can prepare a satisfying breakfast of steaming oatmeal porridge—a food that will appeal to the entire family and furnish the natural means of building up the tissues of the body, thereby imparting strength and vigor.

H-O oatmeal consists of all the good of the oats. The delightful aroma will please you; the complete absence of hulls, dirt and grit will convince you of its superiority; the tender, individual kernels will prove to you how easily H-O oatmeal is acted upon by the digestive fluids and its nourishing properties assimilated. You will look forward with eagerness to your breakfast, if H-O oatmeal is included on the menu. It gives zest to the meal.

Do not confuse H-O oatmeal with the ordinary raw oats sold under the name of "Rolled Oats" or "Crushed Oats." H-O oatmeal is never sold in bulk; it is free from dirt, germs and all impurities.

H-O oatmeal is manufactured from the highest grade of selected stock. After removing all foreign matter, the meat of the oat is subjected to a very high temperature, and by our own patented process is cooked for several hours under heavy steam pressure. This steam-cooking dextrinizes the starch and renders the oats easily digestible.

H-O oatmeal is ready for the breakfast table after from ten to fifteen minutes' boiling, and provides an inviting dish of sweet, clean, separate, tender kernels in place of the sticky, soggy, indigestible mass obtained in cooking the usual "Rolled Oats."

Possibly the "other" kind may be cheaper; but as soon as you have tested and appreciated the quality of H-O oatmeal, you will gladly pay the few cents difference.

THE MERCED RIVER AND EL CAPITAN IN THE DISTANCE

In the Never Never Land

A California writer has shown us entertainingly "The Romance of the Commonplace," and another writer who found his inspiration in western scenes has depicted for us the virility and the romance of the pioneer railroad builder, but it has remained for a California railroad to bring to our doors in beautiful reality that which before was only a fantasy—the Never Never Land of Yosemite in Winter. It has been well said that "pictures speak all languages," but neither words nor canvas nor camera can describe the beauties of this Never Never Land which Peter Pan would take for his own if he but saw it.

There is a more practical side to it however. In England and on the continent thousands journey every winter to St. Moritz to join in or witness the great skeeing contests. They are great social events and reservations are made at the hotels long in advance in much the same way as they are before the great festivals at Bayreuth or the Passion Play at Oberammergau. The curious part of it is that among the crowds that go to witness these sports are hundreds, yes, thousands, of Americans who are ignorant that their own country has similar advantages which equal and often greatly excel any that Europe has to offer. It is not as an idle boast, nor in any spirit of "western expansiveness" that California claims for Yosemite in Winter advantages which no other winter resort in the world can show. The new railroad which follows the winding course of the Merced River up the canyon for eighty miles from Merced has its terminus less than a mile from the entrance to the National Park boundaries. And at the gateway to the park is the new Hotel del Portal, modern in every detail, well equipped and well managed. The climate at El Portal is one of the puzzling anomalies of California, for here is neither snow, nor ice nor cold. Surrounded by towering cliffs over which waterfalls pour in foaming streams, this sheltered spot, filled with warm sunshine, is an ideal winter resort from which trips can be made to a dozen nearby points of interest. You are in the heart of the Sierras in mid-winter, yet no touch of winter is felt. The stage leaves El Portal every morning for Yosemite Valley, returning every evening, and this trip in itself is a perpetual delight. Once over the ridge and down upon the floor of the valley, the change is complete. Like many of nature's masterpieces the full revelation of Yosemite in all its winter splendor is dramatic in its suddenness. You may have read books and poems and turned over the leaves of albums by the score, but none will have fully prepared you for the first great shock of surprise and speechless wonder with which you are overwhelmed as the glory of it all dawns abruptly upon you. You will try to tell your friends about it on your return and you will fail as others have failed. The only thing for them and for you and for all loyal Californians is to see Yosemite in Winter. It is an education. The pleasures of skating, skeeing, tobogganing, sleighing and riding over the snowy trails make a long story which each one may tell for himself.

McCarthy's Message

Poet Taylor making his exit from office with the meekness of a lamb, his whiskers drooping and his great soul in agony, and P. H. McCarthy entering upon his duties with the ferocity and boldness of a lion, formed a spectacle at once pathetic and exhilarating. It was not in strict accordance with the amenities in such cases made and provided, but the star eyed goddess of reform that presides over the new Administration is blind and deaf to poetry and indifferent to conventionality. The new mayor has been criticised for seizing the opportunity on the occasion of his inauguration to challenge the pretensions and performances of his predecessor. His candor has raised a question of taste. It has been ever thus. Never has anything escaped deprecation that smacked of that salient energy called innovation. Now Mayor McCarthy is no debonair and social conservative. He is an innovator, and as such there is no respect of persons with him; he estimates men not on the strength of bodiless pretensions that end in hypocrisy but on what their deeds proclaim. Nor is he to be awed by any simulacrum of respectability that challenges him to competition in honesty and efficiency. Mayor McCarthy has come into office in peculiar circumstances that justify in our opinion his utterances on the occasion of his inauguration. He has come into office on the heels of a so-called "good government Administration," that has boasted the rectitude and wisdom of its performances and questioned the sincerity of everybody in any way responsible for its extinction. He has been asked to vindicate his honesty and intelligence by carrying out the policies of his predecessor. Now these policies do not commend themselves to Mr. McCarthy, and it was quite natural for him to feel that he should give the reasons why. These he gave in language clear and concise, embodying a wealth of facts and figures that ought to be conclusive for anybody not in need of the services of an alienist that we have just emerged from the dominion of hypocrisy, that the reign of imposture has come to an end.

The Ballinger-Pinchot Controversy

In the years to come historians may look back on the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy as one of the turbulent, significant events in a progressive transformation that involved the institutions of this country. Historians may find that it had as much influence in the subversion of established institutions as did the "Mariage de Figaro" in the strengthening of the growing opinions that precipitated the French Revolution. These suggestions are based on the assumption that current happenings adumbrate a tremendous upheaval of our political affairs. Perhaps we exaggerate the importance of the symptoms. Perhaps the men behind the gun overestimate its carrying power. Not infrequently what enthusiastic artificers regard as immortal workmanship Time lays his hand upon and utterly destroys. We see the artificers at work in the bowels of the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy, but what they are fabricating with so much ingenuity, cunning and perseverance may prove as unsubstantial as a dream. When the Proteus-like politician contrives his plot he must avoid the fatality of obviousness. His art is futile if it does not conceal his theatrical expedients and adventitious aids to realism. Now after a critical examination of the current national drama we have come to the conclusion that it is a trifle clumsy in construction. It remains to be seen, however, whether the dramatists have miscalculated the depth of public stupidity. So far, though, it is clear enough that what the plot-builders have designed for their denouement is a political convulsion, nobody can be assured beforehand that the argument is convincing, or that the people will not have one of their sporadic awakenings.

In the Interest of Roosevelt

Whenever there is dissatisfaction with any of the arrangements of society there is danger of a forcible subversion of the entire fabric. Now unquestionably there is dissatisfaction with the state of affairs in this country. We have come within sight of the phenomenon that Macaulay pictured with luminous and prophetic pen and which he predicted as the forerunner of dissolution—the phenomenon of class prejudice. As yet it is but faintly perceptible. The pinch of poverty is not yet acute enough nor the element affected large enough to make a crisis imminent, but the situation inconsequential as it may appear has much of the kind of material that is most suitable to the purposes of the demagogue. And Cleon is once more in the midst of his pestiferous activities. Thriving as always on agitation, he is hanging danger signals up and down the land. He is propagating hallucinations for the greater unrest of the masses. His shibboleth is "the conservation of our national resources" and Roosevelt is his prophet. President Taft says he is for conservation, but it would be fatal to the demagogue's policy to believe him. Hence the long series of attacks on Secretary Ballinger, the obvious purpose of which is to persuade the people that they are being hoodwinked by the President and his Cabinet, thus to prepare the way for the return to power of Caesar Africanus, the patriot who is recognized by the muckrakers as the genius of revolt and whose hold on the imagination of the inflammable people shows no signs of relaxing. In expectation of "the return from Elba" as that vociferous tickler of the masses, John Templeton Graves, calls it, the followers of Roosevelt are on tiptoe and pop-eyed. The man that scorns the trammels of the old-fashioned, not to say obsolete, constitution, the autocrat who established the principle of heredity in the White House, the eminently practical politician who discerns the greater good at all times and is never to be deterred by landmarks from advancing it along the road that appeals to his latest whim—this is the inspiration of the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy.

A Recapitulation

What the end of this mischievous controversy is to be no man can conjecture. But it is within the capacity of any intelligent person to form a pretty accurate estimate of the character and motives of the men who have been trying to undermine confidence in the Taft Administration by representing Secretary Ballinger as the embodiment of policies in direct conflict with those of Theodore Roosevelt. In contentious politics it is hard to see all sides of any question, but here the difficulty is not great. Out of this controversy which leads into the recesses of national policy and individual character it is not hard to sift the facts. Gifford Pinchot, the man by whom it was precipitated, though a very zealous official of unquestioned efficiency, was greatly disappointed and disgruntled when he found at the beginning of Mr. Taft's term that he was not to be permitted to have the same sway in the Department of the Interior that he enjoyed under that somewhat ridiculous Roosevelt satellite, the Hon. James R. Garfield. Mr. Pinchot's emotions soon were reflected in the muckraking press of which he is a pet and protege, a circumstance in itself decidedly apocalyptic. Then began a long series of attacks on Secretary Ballinger. As every imputation upon that gentleman's conduct emanated from an adherent of Pinchot the suspicion gradually crystallized that the forester was the inspiration of the anti-Ballinger campaign. Slowly, too, the President's friends began to suspect the one incorruptibly wise American politician of lending assistance from distant parts. But for a long time the President, good amiable man, was not to be persuaded that a conspiracy had been formed to bring scandal on his Administration. At length the light dawned on his perceptive faculties, and he decided to put an end to the controversy by ordering a thorough investigation of the Interior Department, the General Land Office, the reclamation service and the forestry service. He determined on a public investigation not only of Mr. Ballinger's conduct but of Mr. Pinchot's also. At once the adherents and glorifiers of the spectacular and high-minded forester emitted shrieks of indignation. Their plans had been altered, much to their indignation. An investigation of Mr. Pinchot might lead to revelations touching the heart of the great conspiracy; might, indeed, expose the saintly forester's subterranean relations with the muckraking press and cause him to stand revealed as a hero in buckram, a type of the reformer indigenous to American soil—obsessed with his own righteousness and sceptical of the morals of all other men. With Pinchot in danger of being smoked out the conspirators realized the urgent necessity of preparing the public mind. So they spread wide the intimation that Secretary Ballinger, the archetype of all reactionary iniquity, was about to be whitewashed. The people were warned against taking any stock in the official inquiry. But perhaps the facts would come out and prove unsusceptible to the usual coloring process! In a state of panic the patriots called another conference. A new plan of action was agreed upon, the chief feature of which was the subtle stratagem by which Mr. Pinchot compelled his own dismissal, the object doubtless being to get himself out of the danger zone. Now it must be clear enough that the zealous forester though an idealist in office, is not guided by the highest principles in his own personal conduct. If it has not yet been proved that this great Roosevelt reformer did not scruple at resorting to underhanded tactics for the purpose of besmirching President Taft, it is at least apparent that his warmest sympathies are with the cowardly coterie that is conducting the unsavory campaign. By his own words, if not his acts, his treachery certainly seems to be betrayed. And now have we not arrived at an understanding of the whole nasty business? If not let us consult the Examiner, which is one of the organs of the conspiracy. "The commanding figure of Theodore Roosevelt," says the Examiner, "looms up behind Gifford Pinchot." Furthermore: "The Examiner correspondent has information to the effect that Roosevelt has advised Pinchot throughout the controversy." Perhaps Mr. Roosevelt has reason to be proud of the advice he has given, but as to this we shall know more before the investigation is far advanced. While the people want to know whether Secretary Ballinger has done aught to warrant the assertion that he has not performed his duties in accordance with law, they also have some curiosity with respect to the behaviour of the distinguished politicians who have personally conducted a national scandal.

A Plea For the Life Savers

One of the things that passeth understanding is the temperament that is predisposed to peril and hardships in the struggle for existence. That this temperament is not foreign to human nature we know because of the plenitude of men that are eager to engage in hazardous occupations. When this temperamental phenomenon may be attributed to the passion for glory it is not above the commonplace, but it is observable in cases that afford no incentive or spur to the appetite for distinction. Take for example the case of the man that works in a powder mill. He has none of the qualities of a Hobson. For him there is no pedestal in sight, nothing in the nature of exaltation in prospect save that of the elevation that follows an explosion. But accompanying the perennially blooming chance of sudden annihilation is the assurance of good wages, which explains his choice of occupation. The powder mill worker is a bold gambler who stakes his life against his wages. With an extraordinary run of luck he may win long enough to keep the game going until he is overtaken by a fatal cold. This gambler, being a sordid individual, does not perfectly exemplify the temperament we have in mind. A much better exemplar is the man that belongs to the live saving patrol. He is in a class by himself, and it is to him above all others engaged in perilous occupations that we would call public attention. In the career of the life saver perils are ever imminent and appalling hardships are ever endured. What are the considerations that actuate him? Assuredly he has not a passion for the limelight, for it never plays on the sinking ship. When men are rescued by the patrol, the service is credited with the achievement, but not the individual life saver; his name is never mentioned. Were these life savers paid good wages the incentive to their zeal would seem to be clear enough, but the fact is their pay is scant. They receive the equivalent of $700 a year. Out of their income they must furnish their own uniforms and storm clothes, and if married, as about 80 per cent of them are, they must support the family from which they are necessarily absent for three-quarters of the year. In case of death "by reason of perilous service or any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty" a provision for two years is made for a dependent mother, a widow, a child or children under 16 years of age. Now surely this is not enough. These men patrol the coasts night and day. The worse the weather the greater must be their vigilance. Consider the hardships of a lonely patrol across miles of sand through the hours of a raging winter storm! Where are hardships to be encountered equal to those experienced by the patrol in midwinter on the shores of the great lakes or on some stretches of the Atlantic seaboard? The efficiency of the patrol is evidenced by last year's record. There were 300 vessels warned of danger; 459 met with disaster, and of 6,377 persons on board these vessels only eight were lost. Far from prosaic is the existence which the life savers lead. What induces them to lead it is beyond our powers of conjectures. For a man of family the career of a life saver is a forbidding one, but since with the connivance of Uncle Sam there are men of family engaged therein it ought to be considered inhuman not to make adequate provision for those that are dependent on them. The soldier and the sailor through re-enlistment may look forward to retirement pay. The same arrangement should in simple justice be made for the life saving service. Unfortunately there are only 2,000 men in the service. Not enough to constitute a formidable consituency for a Congressman, even though all were crowded into one district. Hardly enough to inspire an editorial writer on a Hearst newspaper.

San Jose has growing pains. These things seems to be contagious in this section of the State.

Poet Taylor will answer Mayor McCarthy in an ode that will remind us of the flaming wheels of Olympian chariots.

A new adjective has been added to the language. To be "tafty" is to be all smiles and immune to all forms of the grouch.

Somebody has discovered that there are 14,000 oysters in a ton. Now will somebody be kind enough to ascertain the average weight of a lobster?

If the Superman is really half woman we have it right here in San Francisco. It's on the bench, and can be recognized by its fishwifely tantrums.

District Attorney Langdon appears to have burglarized his own office. But of course he knew of nothing that it was advisable to conceal.

Pinchot has heard the voice of Patriotism summoning him to the presidency. It may be somewhat premature to predict that his will be known as the Gumshoe Cabinet.

Democritus in Mexico

Being a Literal Transcript of Personal Impressions Concerning Man and Things in a Land That Has Ceased to Deserve the Gringo Appellation of Manana

Our old friend James Creelman is in Mexico. He has just emerged from an unsuccessful effort to rouse another crusade against the unspeakable Turk on behalf of the Armenian martyrs. He told us all about it at the Young Men's Christian Association the other night. It was horrible. Even the Mexican young Christians were compelled to admit that it was worse than anything they had ever heard. If Creelman had called for recruits for his crusade, I am sure that most of these Christianized Mexicans would have responded—the Mexican Christian is an impulsive person, always ready to tilt the fortuitous windmill after the manner of his paternal ancestor of La Mancha. But the famous journalist did not organize his Mexican legion for the immediate invasion of Islam; he merely pocketed his lecture fee of 100 pesos and let it go at that. I am informed that he is in negotiation with the American club to tell them how he interviewed the Pope—the only hitch between the contracting parties being the amount in pesos.

Creelman is pertinent to this experience because he is ostensibly in Mexico to write an authentic history of the republic. As a matter of fact he is here on invitation of "American interests" to write an authentic biography of Porfirio Diaz. Many Diaz biographies have been written by those who have had access to the data on file at Chapultepec; but heretofore the biographers have not succeeded in getting the proper point of view—their perspective of this great man has been foreshortened by too close contact. It is hoped that the Creelman biography will be glamored by the enchantment that distance lends. Until his present inroad upon Mexico Mr. Creelman had not met President Diaz but once—a memorable occasion on which Diaz learned to know Creelman as others know him; an agreeable consummation which was reported at considerable length by Mr. Creelman himself in one of the New York magazines.

Unfortunately for the time worn reputation of the man that made Pingyang famous, he mixed the personality of Diaz "as I saw him" with too much Mexican history, and one of the Mexican newspapers, the Daily Record, did not hesitate to print this Creelman history in deadly parallel with the real history from which he had plagiarized it. However, a little thing like that is impotent to feaze Creelman. Charges of plagiarism are as the frivolous gossip of queridas and novias of a Tacubaya casa chica for Creelman. The man that could sit calmly at an Astor House beer table in Shanghai penning a graphic account of the slaughter of Ping-yang, then happening eight hundred miles away, would not be likely to suffer many twinges of conscience upon conviction of stealing another man's history of Mexico and taking the money of a publisher for it upon the false pretense that it was his own.

How many pesos Creelman will receive for this special biography of the President of the Mexican Republic, I have been unable to ascertain. It is hinted that some of the pesos will be paid by the "American colony"; and that the Mexican government will make up the deficit as it may be figured by Creelman. He will, of course, retain his royalty; but that will be a mere bagatelle. The necessity of a Creelman biography of Porfirio Diaz at this time is only apparent in the possibility that it will be used to offset the unfavorable impression produced by Carlo di Fornaro's book on the same subject. The defect of Fornaro's book was excess of invective; the glaring fault of Creelman's volume is sure to be exuberance of panegyric. To arrive at a fairly just estimate of Diaz it will be necessary to read both books. That will help the sale of Creelman and it will not impair the profit of Fornaro.

It is not known whether Creelman knows Spanish well enough to order a dinner in a Mexican fonda; but lack of knowledge in anything has never balked the Creelman purpose. The less he knows of his subject the more readily does he write about it. In his famous account of the battle of Ping-yang his spelling of Chinese and Japanese names was atrocious; they were in the phonetic form and were like nothing else on land or sea, but like the wound of Mercutio "they served," and after all they could pass unnoticed in the mass of graphic detail that flowed from the Creelman imagination. As for his Spanish, it is related that he visited the offices of the Mexican Electric Light and Power Company the other day, and observing the great gilt sign across the building inscribed "Luz Fuerza," he was inspired to ask in a loud and distinct voice, "What is this 'Laz Foorza' anyway?" Those who answered his inquiry were careful to avoid repetition of the name. Such is the etiquette of the high bred, civilized, far traveled Mexican—his house is always at the disposal of the stranger guest; but he reserves his fee simple in the furniture.

There is another visiting journalist sojourning temporarily in our midst. This first aid to popular knowledge is not as eminent as the other, but his friends have high hopes. His name is Otheman Stevens; he is of the tribe of Hearst in Los Angeles; and he is entrusted with an important mission. Journalist Stevens will immediately proceed to Yucatan to refute, upon the testimony of the henequen kings of that much maligned section of the republic, the villainous libels of John Kenneth Turner's "Barbarous Mexico." It will be an easy task. All the henequen kings are agreed that their treatment of the peons and the Yaqui slaves is much better than these degraded creatures deserve, and they will not hesitate to tell Mr. Stevens so over the wine and pecans at every dinner served in his honor.

The reason for this "refutation" of a story that everybody in Mexico knows to be as near the truth as magazines and newspapers ever approach, is even clearer than the necessity for a Creelman biography of "the Czar of Mexico." It is the desire of William Randolph Hearst to repay in something more than mere "mutual concession" the vast favors he has received at the hands of the so-called "Partido Cientifico," that inner circle of high Mexican finance upon whose final decision depends every concession granted in this "land of opportunity."

It is even said that it is Mr. Hearst's purpose almost immediately to establish a daily newspaper, a Mexican Examiner or American, in Mexico City, to be printed simultaneously in Spanish and English. The object of this proposed Hearst newspaper is said to be to assist the "Circulo Amigos Porfiristas" in shelving Vice-president Ramon Corral and substituting Don Enrique Creel, Governor of Chihuahua, for the presidential succession. This explanation is quite plausible—if the premise is true; for Hearst's landed and other concessions are mostly in northern Mexico and largely in Chihuahua. Personally he is an intimate friend of Governor Creel.

I will tell you later what I predict for a Hearst newspaper conducted on strictly Hearst principles in Mexico City. In the meantime let me say that the mission of Journalist Stevens to the ultimate hot lands of Mexico is perfunctory—a policy assignment. As Journalist Stevens is no more conversant with the Spanish language than is his distinguished contemporary, Journalist Creelman, he will be unable to learn from the "slaves" of Yuctatan

The Los Angeles Aviation Meet

Being a Description of the Spectacular Paulhan Flight on the First Day With Some Stray Remarks About the Way in Which Los Angeles Does Things.

By Edward F. O'Day

Dominguez field is a broad loamy meadow with gentle undulations and grass-covered slopes. On its south side has been erected a huge grandstand to accommodate 30,000 people. Here and there the white tents of the aviators break the monotony of the aspect while off in the distance are the white-washed pylons which mark the limits of the course. A railing extending from the entrance to the grandstand, (no small distance), is patrolled by deputy sheriffs who keep all but aviators, employees and newspapermen off the course. Behind the railing the spectators are banked in dense battalions and the grandstand is half full. There are easily twenty thousand people in attendance. They came in the morning, bringing lunches with them or buying "hot dog," hamburger steak and coffee from the vendors in a string of booths that give the field the appearance of a county fair. The crowd has been aroused to enthusiasm by two flights made by Glen H. Curtiss and another made by Willard in a Curtiss machine. Their enthusiasm was natural because they had never seen an airship rise from the ground in all their lives before and these first flights by Americans were exceedingly well done. But as the afternoon wore on the crowd began to hunger for a change of fare —so soon does an American audience exhaust the novelty even of an aeroplane—and it was a distinct relief when two immense strange-looking dirigible balloons were floated out of their sheds. One belonged to Beachy, the other to the well-known Roy Knabenshue. They are not easy to describe by similes. The big gas bags certainly are cigar-shaped and in color and inflation remind one of a pork sausage. But you must see a dirigible to appreciate the courage of the man who risks his life in it, so frail does it appear and so easily swayed by the currents of air. It was duly megaphoned that Knabenshue and Beachy would make a flight together and after lengthy preliminaries of cranking the propeller the dirigibles were shot upwards. They dipped and careened and rocked but kept their course well toward the western pylon of the field and all eyes were focussed on them to watch their turning. Very few in that great throng heard a noise like the chugging of a motorcycle in a part of the field farthest removed from the grandstand and very few noticed that an unfamiliar airship was sneaking along at a little distance above the ground, speeding in the general direction of the two dirigibles. But when the machine shot suddenly to a height of one hundred feet and attention was distracted from the dirigibles, a great roar went up from the crowd and by a sort of intuition, it seemed, everybody learned at once that Paulhan was making a flight in one of his Farman machines. The dirigibles, having doubled the pylon, started back over the course with the wind behind them, racing madly. Paulhan followed in his immense airship, cutting through the blue with amazing speed. It was a race between the dirigibles and the biplane, everybody could see that, and such a thrilling race as nobody in that multitude had ever seen before. Midway the length of the course Paulhan overtook and passed the two dirigibles which were nosing along together about twenty-five feet beneath him. The flight of the dirigibles continued but there was little attention paid to them. It was all for Paulhan. After passing the dirigibles he swerved suddenly and circled the course again. When he reached the pylon nearest the western end of the grandstand he went far off the field and finally disappeared. Then with a dramatic suddenness which seems part of nature with this amazing aviator he poked the nose of his machine over the top of the grandstand and swooped down to the field again so close to the heads of the spectators that one loud gasp was heard from innumerable throats. Paulhan brought his machine to earth as impetuously as he had started it. He had been in the air for eight minutes and twenty-eight seconds and he had covered three and three-quarters miles. An excited crowd of French aviators and newspapermen gathered about to congratulate and the air was full of exclamations about the "glory of France" and other pleasant things. But Paulhan, serious-faced, was busily engaged unscrewing a nut and only when a persistent photographer had implored several times did he look up and smile a winning smile. The Paulhan machine is much larger than the Curtiss biplane and much heavier. It has a big rotary motor which impresses one with its tremendous potency and when the machine passes overhead, the simile so often used of the flapping of myriad wings seems weak and inadequate. Yet big and noisy as it is, the Farman biplane is as graceful, as supple and as sure in the air as a skylark. Watching it, you know that the aviator has it under perfect control and that the secret of his marvelous serenity as he sits hunched at the steering post is an absolute confidence in his ability to stay in the air as long as he desires, to go where he desires and to descend where he desires. Soaring like a bird the machine also returns to terra firma with the lightness and ease of a bird. Perhaps it is because every movement of the Farman biplane is so birdlike that one immediately prefers it to the Curtiss machine and decides that Farman and Paulhan are closer to the solution of the aviation problem than Curtiss and Harmon. As unostentatiously as he had entered the race against the dirigibles Paulhan made a second flight with hardly ten minutes' breathing interval. This time he cut capers in the air. He flew by the grandstand with both hands off the steering gear, waving his hat and gesticulating to the howling throng. He darted over the crowd and swooped back again, making straight for a group of some twenty or so who stood in the center of the field, hypnotized by his performance. Fearing that he would come down upon them the men scurried in every direction, only to find that Paulhan had darted upward again and was waving them a mocking adieu as he flew off toward the end of the course. I do not know whether it was the dramatic instinct which made Paulhan race after a flock of sparrows but it was a strange sight to watch the birds scatter and fly down the wind before this rushing racking bird, the like of which they, in common with the human beings on Dominguez field, had never seen before. This second flight of the French aviator lasted for ten minutes and covered four and one-half miles.

To describe how one feels when witnessing for the first time the spectacle of a man mounting into the air and flying is not easy. It is a sight certain to awake emotion. No matter how much one may have read about aviators, the printed page and the photographs can convey no real idea of the wonder of it all. You remember that the man up above you is helping to solve the problem of centuries; that he is realizing a dream which is older than the story of Daedalus and Icarus and the legend of Phaeton driving the chariot of the sun. Patriotism plays its part, of course, and there is a glow of pride when Curtiss, the American, flies about the course. But after all, the problem is a world-problem and not a matter of nationality and when, on that first day of aviation, Paulhan the Frenchman surpassed the exhibition given by Curtiss the American, there was nobody in that multitude who begrudged the foreigner the credit and the applause which he deserved. I am sure too that when Curtiss, the day after, turned the tables on Paulhan all the sons of France gathered at Dominguez were equally generous about the matter.

When it is remembered that the aviation meet at Los Angeles is the first that has been held in America and the second of any consequence to be held in the world—that of Rheims alone being comparable with it in magnitude and significance—the personality of the projector becomes important. Dick Ferris is the man who did it all. Beginning on the first of December Ferris not only planned the aviation meet, but succeeded in raising $100,000 by voluntary subscription to carry out his big project. The newspapermen who have watched the progress of the work tell me that no man ever contended with the difficulties which Dick Ferris has met in bringing his dream to reality. There was a time, they say, when Ferris was hard put to it to find money to pay for postage and had to solve at the same time a hundred problems that arose over the method of bringing foreign aviators to Los Angeles, smoothing the way so that jealous rivals might meet on common ground and coping with an amazing number of cranks who sought admission for machines which were as little likely to leave the ground as a steam-roller. Through it all Dick Ferris preserved a demeanor of pleasant affability and was rewarded for his pains by the honor of financing and carrying through the most significant event that Los Angeles has ever known.

Of course Dick Ferris had Los Angeles to work with —and that is a great deal, much as we of San Francisco may hate to admit it. There is a spirit of enterprise about everything which Los Angeles does very different from the spirit which actuates San Francisco in its big events. When Ferris announced that he would have to put $25,000 in the bank to the order of the French aviators before they would consent to cross the Atlantic, the $25,000 was immediately forthcoming. When he told that he would have to guarantee them another $25,000, the $25,000 was guaranteed by millionaires of Los Angeles without a murmur. When the meet was only ten days away and Ferris said that he would build a grandstand to accommodate 30,000 persons there may have been some incredulity about the possibility of getting the work done on time, but the work was done to the minute. Co-operation spells part of the secret of Ferris' marvelous achievement. The merchants co-operated, the railroad co-operated, the newspapers co-operated, the crowds co-operated. The result is that the people who wish to attend the meet are carried in perfect comfort seventeen miles out of Los Angeles in record time, are comfortably taken care of on the field and are treated to a history-making spectacle. All credit to Los Angeles and to Dick Ferris for what has been accomplished.

Have we a Dick Ferris in San Francisco? If we have, I am not able to recall his name. Down in Santa Cruz they have their Fred Swanton, but what promoter of the Ferris or Swanton type have we in this metropolis? The question would be humiliating if we had not been so successful with the Portola which marked a turning point in San Francisco enterprise. But the Portola left a deficit which had to be made up by citizens who undoubtedly thought that they had already given sufficient in money and hard work. So the question, if not humiliating, is at least disquieting. The San Franciscan who attended the aviation meet and did not go away impressed with certain admirable characteristics of Los Angeles missed the most obvious lesson of the big event.

The Maiden's Quavering Heart

Miss Marie was half romantic, half practical, and a rather pretty girl. She could play the piano a little, knew some French, was always tastefully dressed, had a little nose gracefully uptilted, and eyes that were sometimes a light and sometimes a dark blue.

Once she had a remarkable dream.

She saw a balance suspended from the sky. The scales moved up and down without finding their equilibrium.

Two angels kept putting things in them.

On one side a dark angel in high silk hat and frock coat put in diamonds, pearls and gold.

On the other side a white, glorified angel put in tears, sighs and songs.

Above, on the tongue of the balance, was suspended her own heart. She recognized it instantly.

This little heart quavered and fluttered and kept moving from one scale to the other.

"Which will you have—
The ring of gold,
The music of song?
Will you have pearls or tears?"

Thus sang the angels, and the little heart quavered and knew not which to choose.

Suddenly she thought of a device—women think even in their dreams. She sprang up and seated herself upon the scale containing the pearls and diamonds and gold, and in order not to weigh down the scale she rested her head upon the other!

Her body was with the gold, the pearls and the diamonds; her head amid the tears, the sighs and the songs.

And still her heart kept ceaselessly vibrating from one to the other!

TWO SENSATIONAL INCIDENTS OF THE FIRST AVIATION DAY AT LOS ANGELES

Casimir

By Max and Alex Fischer (From the French)

For the last three weeks I had been every evening to the Place Chateaudun to meet a young woman who joined me on leaving her work. She was married. So far I had succeeded in getting her to accompany me to five cafes and three pastry shops.

As I neared our usual meeting-place I hailed a passing cab.

"Hi! cabby—by the hour—it has just struck half-past six. Go past the omnibus station, Place Chateaudun, and stop a few houses further on."

The cabman, a big, red-faced man, seemed possessed of a most unpleasant temper. He violently abused a carter who was in his way and swore continually at his horse for not going fast enough.

"Stop, cabby! Yes, there, in front of No. 22. Don't move. When I return in a few minutes drive off as fast as you can and go straight to No. 34 rue St. Marc." My bachelor quarters are in the rue St. Marc.

I made my way to the omnibus station. Rose was not there. The inspector seemed to know me by now, and, without giving me time to say whether I wanted to go to the Odeon, the Halle-aux-Vins or Vincennes, he handed out to me an old and expired ticket for the Gare de l'Est-Trocadero line.

"H'm! H'm! H'm!"

My pretty sweetheart had let me know she was there by a slight cough. She made sure that I had heard her and then, as usual, walked out first—we never spoke to each other in the omnibus office.

My plan was succeeding splendidly. I was now following in Rose's footsteps along the sidewalk of the rue Chateaudun, and admiring her pretty figure. I thought with gratitude of Hortense, her friend, who lived at the other end of the rue Soufflot and was willing to swear to any number of alibis, should the husband become suspicious. I calculated the number of seconds Rose would need to reach No. 22, preparing to join her on the instant she reached it, when I meant to take advantage of her surprise and emotion to hurry her into the waiting cab.

But just as I was rushing forward, Rose suddenly stopped, and then, to my great astonishment, turned around. Had the presence of the carriage given her a hint of my intentions? She was on the point of retracing her steps, when, with one bound, I was by her side. Pale to the lips, she murmured:

"Look out! Take care—my husband!"

I cast a rapid glance around the street, but could see no one. After all, what matter? I tore open the cab door and, not giving her a moment to struggle, almost forced her to the seat and, for greater security, pulled down the blinds.

The horse started and by my side was Rose, sobbing.

"What, little Rose, tears? Yes, I know you feel nervous. But you were dreaming, darling. There was not a soul in the street."

"Leave me—leave me! You've done a clever trick. Think of it—my husband!"

"Your husband! Your husband! But where is your husband? Deuce take it—show him to me."

Rose raised her tear-stained face—another sob shook her—she simply stretched out her arm. "There, Maurice, there in front of you—on the box."

I had often told Rose—I know her surname now: Rose 14122—I had often said to her during our walks: "Rose, how happy we shall be when at last we find ourselves alone, quite alone."

The realization of our longing, however, did not bring us all the joy we had anticipated. Shut in by the four sides of a cab, we were entirely separated from the rest of humanity; yet I admit that my felicity was much inferior to my dreams.

Cowering in one corner of the cab Rose was murmuring: "What an idiot! Besides, I don't even know you!"

Glued to the other corner, I watched with terror street succeeding street. A sudden movement awakened me to stern reality. Rose was shaking me by the arm.

"Maurice! Maurice, you're asleep—don't you see Casimir has stopped?"

Casimir? I passed my hand over my forehead. Casimir? Who was he? Ah, yes!

"Quick, tell him some address, anywhere, quick, or he'll turn round and we're lost."

I put my head out of the window and called out: "I say, Casim—ah, um—I say, take us—how funny, I can't remember the name of the street—ah, yes—here—take us to the Boulevard Haussmann—No. 172."

It really seemed better and to our mutual advantage to try to make friends again. Together we might think of some way out of the dilemma. Casimir had not noticed us as we got in, and possibly he would not observe us if we got out, and I thought it best for Rose to try to slip away at the first stop. The sight of a clock confirmed me in this idea—I saw it was twenty minutes past seven. Splendid! That would make just one hour and I could give Casimir a handsome tip.

I looked round the cab, but like all those of the Urbaine company, it had but two doors, one on each side. Much as I longed for it, I could not discover a third one at the back.

Suddenly Rose called out, wringing her hands: "No, no! I shall not get out. Cocotte would scent me and begin to neigh. Casimir would kill us!"

To prevent Rose from going off into a noisy fit of hysterics I felt the urgency of inventing a new plan on the instant, for in anticipation I already heard with dread the "Oh! Oh! Oh's!" and the "Ah! Ah! Ah's!" into which she might relapse. I examined the problem from all sides, but could find no solution. One thing, however, was self-evident: if we did not get out, we must stay in.

"Don't cry, little girl, we'll stay right here in this growler—we'll stay here just as long as is necessary—two, four, six days! I have enough to settle up the cab fare for a whole week. I don't know whether you are like me, but my constitution enables me to go without food for a very long time. I remember once—I was five years old—the doctor ordered me to fast for forty-eight hours, and—"

Tears again filled Rose's eyes. "But—but if a strike breaks out, my poor Maurice, Casimir belongs to the union—he will stop work like the others."

Had the strike broken out while we were discussing it? The horse had come to a standstill, but Rose and I, lost in the warmth of our debate, had not noticed it until the five fingers of a large, horny hand tapped impatiently on the front window-pane.

"Hey, sir! Didn't you say Boulevard Haussmann? Well, here we are, and have been for ten minutes."

I put my head out of the window, and as gently as I could, I confided to Casimir: "I beg your pardon, cabby. I've made a mistake. It is No. 172 I want, the Boulevard St. Michel, not Haussmann."

It was black night. I owed No. 14122 for eight and a quarter hours at two francs an hour, that is to say, sixteen and one-half francs. I had sent him, more apologetically each time, from No. 172 Boulevard St. Michel to No. 15 rue Lepic; from there to No. 64 avenue de la Grande Armee and from the avenue de la Grande Armee to the Boulevard Orano. Besides, I owed him

The McCarthy Philippic

"Pour not water on a drowned mouse" is not among the maxims to which Mayor McCarthy gives heed. Witness the sousing that he gave the mutual admiration coterie of the Taylor dispensation. It was certainly a fine ducking. But for the victims—those that were typical of the dispensation—there is not much pity. They do not excite compassion for several reasons. One of these reasons is their own deficiency in that divine quality. These men have never been silent as to the weakness of others, never helpful, tolerant or tender. Nothing gave them so much pleasure as to indulge in the reproach that scourged and the anger that branded. Never by them was dispensed the oil and wine of the good Samaritan. Now it appears that while reproving others they neglected to correct themselves. Another reason for the withholding of compassion is that the McCarthy indictment is a mighty convincing document. The wincing that has been observed indicates that there are withers not unwrung; that out of the municipal pasture there cavorted some galled jades when Mayor McCarthy ended his remarkable philippic.

Taylor Indicted

From the black gulf of political obscurity into which the sad, grey poet plunged after alighting from the people's automobile for the last time, there has risen a melancholy protest not unlike the moan of a sinner wafted from Purgatory. Just before his evanishment he thought to pooh-pooh the McCarthy indictment out of the tribunal of public opinion. This looks like a reversal of form, an abandonment of the principle that a man charged with crime is presumed to be guilty until he establish his innocence. This principle is of the ethics of the Taylor dispensation. Its application was insisted upon by the poet and all his fellow proponents of advertised righteousness. Far be it from me, however, to assume that so far as the poet himself is concerned the principle was a mere pose or costume—something which had nothing to do with his generous heart or with the deeps of his nature. Let no man point to him as an example of acute atrophy of sensibility, of the decay and ruin of the moral principle that gave tone to his esthetic sense. Let it not be assumed that there is any exception to the rule that what is sauce for the goose is likewise sauce for the gander. Poet Taylor is under an indictment, one that is not as demurrable as a Langdon indictment drawn for the benefit of Hire-him Johnson. Come good poet—your plea!

An Omission

The only technical objection that can be urged against the McCarthy indictment is that it does not state all the facts. It states sufficient, however, to constitute a cause of action. Its most salient omission is with reference to the appointment of a whitewashing committee for the purpose of levelling in a night a mountain of crimes. The Taylor record presents nothing that parallels in transcendent audacity the appointment of this committee, every member of which was known to be either in aggressive or passive sympathy with the men whose conduct they were asked to investigate. Even Father Crowley, the one man who might by the general public have been regarded as unbiassed, was selected because of his intimate relations with Fremont Older, Eustace Cullinan and Matt I. Sullivan. The strongest indication of the crookedness of the graft prosecution was the fact that Mayor Taylor, the puppet of that infamous cabal, did not dare to go beyond the bounds of the clique in quest of men to make an impartial investigation. This one bold stroke of dissimulation and deceit ought to be enough to afford any fair-minded person insight into the depths of the whole nasty business. Certainly without anything more tangible upon which to base a presumption, as a specimen of conduct it ought to serve as an index to the general character of the administration presided over by Dr. Taylor.

A Bad Precedent

To regard the whole McCarthy message as an indictment of the last Administration is to fail wofully to appreciate the purport of his message. The Mayor has done something more than bring insight to bear on the conduct of his predecessor. He has pointed out evil practices for the purpose of indicating the line of conduct that he thinks should be pursued by his official family. Take for example the method by which a piece of property at North Beach was acquired by the city, a transaction which the Mayor regards with suspicion. The method is certainly not to be commended. It is not advisable for public servants, however honest their intentions, to engage in underhanded practices in behalf of the city. When the Supervisors decide to purchase a piece of realty they have no right to assume that the owner will attempt to cheat the city. It is their privilege to acquire the property under the law of eminent domain, and the owner is entitled to whatever a court determines the property is worth. This is the way the city generally acquires property for its purposes. To establish a precedent such as was established with the connivance of Dr. Taylor is, to say the least, reprehensible. It opens the door to graft. Dr. Taylor wishes us to assume that graft was impossible while he was on the job communing with the muses, but like all self-anointed reformers he assists us in appreciating the proverb, "One man may better steal a horse than another look over the hedge."

His Sentiment Toward the Heathen

In calling attention to the wide-open character of the town with Dr. Taylor on the job Mayor McCarthy's purpose was to give expression to a sentiment in which all intelligent men concur, but which the Supervisors who have just retired from office never had the courage to avow. The sentiment is that while contamination flows from the deadfalls of our white gamblers there is none from the fantan resorts of Chinatown. Mayor McCarthy has declared his purpose to encourage the Chinese to return to town and swell to its old proportions the colony to which we owe much of the color that excites the interest of visitors and which is one of the city's best assets. The puritanic attitude toward the Chinese is without rhyme or reason but fraught with mischief. This attitude assumed ostensibly out of a sense of morality has been productive of more immorality than could ever be packed into Chinatown. The restraints to which our moralists have demanded that the Chinese be subjected have served to make them the victims of blackmail, and the opportunity for blackmail has tempted and corrupted our police and other officials. Mayor McCarthy realizes that the morals of Chinatown are not the morals of San Francisco and that the Chinese affect our morals only when we attempt to dominate theirs. He has not given utterance to profound philosophy, but he has courageously exhibited contempt for the hypocrisy that has achieved the dignity of a national trait. There is reason, however, to be astonished as well as pleased with his sentiments, for they are the sentiments of a leader of organized labor, a lusty champion of the rights of the workingman. It is interesting to reflect that some years ago the labor leader who would have dared to espouse the cause of the Chinese would have been promptly consigned to outer darkness. What will the good people of New England say when they learn that to San Francisco, of all the cities of America, the Chinese have been invited to come and make themselves happy after their fashion? They will at least conclude that we are not so benighted as they have believed.

Frank Johnson, Professional Aviator

Frank H. Johnson of San Francisco and San Rafael has joined the ranks of professional aviators. Those who thought that the wealth of this fashionable clubman would incline him to amateur activity in the air were mightily mistaken. Johnson is to be an aviator for revenue only; he is not going to risk his neck for a thrill. Whenever he emulates the sky lark it will be for cold cash. The visible sign that Johnson does not regard aviation as a sport but as a business is before me as I write in the shape of a card which announces that Frank H. Johnson is the State agent of the Herring-Curtiss Aeroplane Co. Johnson, I am willing to predict, will prove an energetic and picturesque agent. He has always adopted methods both of business and recreation which were startlingly original and in the unexplored realm of aviation he will find unusual opportunities for the exercise of his talents. That he will make money out of airships I verily believe, for hitherto he has made money out of everything to which he has turned his attention. Money-making is one of the easiest things Frank Johnson does.

Johnson's Experience With Airships

I met Johnson in Los Angeles during the aviation meet now going on and heard from his own lips the particulars of his interest in aviation and his embarkation in the business. His interest, it seems, has extended over ten years but his actual experience is still measured by days. It had lasted just eighteen days when I conversed with him. Ever since the French began to experiment with dirigibles and heavier-than-air machines Johnson has been sitting up and taking eager notice. An enthusiastic and successful owner and salesman of automobiles and motorcycles, he decided that he would turn his attention and invest his money in aeroplanes whenever the progress of discovery made good returns on the investment certain. Johnson has been reading the aviation journals ever since they were started and he picked out the psychological time to go to New York and obtain a practicable flying machine plus a flying machine agency. The Glen H. Curtiss biplane cost him $5,000; the agency, he expects, will net him that sum many, many times multiplied.

His Experience in Life Insurance

Not the least interesting part of Johnson's contact with the aviation business is his experience with the life insurance companies. In various companies Johnson carried $84,000 of life insurance. That was a few days ago. At that time the companies considered him a good risk; he was young and strong and husky; and although a somewhat reckless automobilist, the accidents had happened, not to him but to the pedestrians. When it was announced for the first time that Johnson had determined to tempt the dangers of the air in a Curtiss biplane, a great fear took hold of the insurance companies which carried his policies. One after another the agents waited on him and before the day was over the $84,000 of insurance was all canceled. Just how Johnson feels towards those insurance agents I dare not tell—in his own picturesque language—but I imagine that if he is ever to be so unfortunate as to have an airship accident, he would like to have his machine fall on a group made up of the men who made those cancellations. But that was not the end of Johnson's experience. Following closely on the action of the insurance agents came a cable from Lloyds of London offering to insure him for $15,000 for one year at a premium of $7,800. To that offer Johnson did not deign to reply, for he is emphatically a business man, not a gambler and the proposal to bet Lloyds $7,800 against $15,000 that he would tumble out of the sky like Vulcan and break his neck did not appeal to him.

How It Feels to Fly

Johnson described to me the first sensations an aviator experiences when he makes his initial departure from terra firma. He says that as the tyro grasps the steering post the machine looks awfully frail but that as he must keep his eyes rivetted on the front control this thought gradually fades away. As the machine runs along the ground gathering speed the sensation is much the same as that of a motorist, but it is very different when the machine begins to soar. In the vivid language of Johnson you feel as though each particular vertebra were leaving your body by a different route; also as though your intestines were rising up to titillate your palate. It will be seen that this is a very complicated sensation. I learned also that one felt as one might feel in a tremendously fast elevator that stops suddenly —only more so; or as a fish, not of the flying variety, might feel in the air. At the same time, Mr. Johnson informed me, it is much easier to run an aeroplane than an automobile, the mechanism being simpler and the balancing largely a matter of natural instinct. He says that Glen H. Curtiss' favorite method of teaching a pupil to fly consists in escorting him to the seat of the biplane, directing him where to rivet his eyes and place his hands and leaving him with the terse command, "Fly!" And he told me that one can fly at the rate of forty miles an hour without feeling any particular discomfort from the rushing currents of air.

What Johnson Plans To Do

Johnson's plans for the future will interest his many friends and admirers in San Francisco and San Rafael. While it is just possible that he may remain in the south for some little time, it will not be very long before he comes north again. Then look out for a sensation. Commuters, especially, be on the alert. Johnson intends to fly from San Rafael to San Francisco and back again. Here is a feat not so marvelous as Bleriot's flight across the English Channel, but surely as picturesque as Wilbur Wright's sail around the Statue of Liberty in New York harbor. Johnson is even considering the advisability of varying the monotony of a direct flight from San Rafael to San Francisco by cutting a caper around Goat Island (pun not deliberate). When this spectacle is provided for the delectation of dwellers by the bay it will dwarf in interest the pageantry of the arrival of the fleet. Johnson intends thereafter to bring seven or eight Curtiss biplanes to California and to fly through the State in them, giving exhibitions and selling the machines as he goes. As I have said, he will not exhibit as an aviator and risk breaking his neck for nothing; he will expect to be paid for every flight. As for selling the machines, Johnson anticipates no difficulty in finding men of wealth desirous of a new play thing. In fact he says that if he doesn't sell the machines he will eat them.

He Has Not Flown Yet

It may be expected that I will give herewith a detailed description of one of Frank H. Johnson's flights, but I am confronted by a peculiar situation. The fact is that I have not seen Frank Johnson fly. I have seen his machine in the hangar but never in the sky and I have it from Johnson's lips that he has not flown yet. I write this before the aviation meet is concluded, but I am not sure that Johnson will fly during the meet. He told me that he was not sure that he would care to fly before the Los Angeles throngs. As I write, therefore, Johnson's flying is all a matter of futurity. Let it not be inferred, however, that Johnson's description of the sensation of flying is a mere flight of fancy. By no means. Johnson has associated a great deal with Glen H. Curtiss and has had ample apportunity to learn from him just how it feels to fly. Remember too that Johnson's actual experience with biplanes has only extended over a few days. In due course we will have news of Johnson soaring in his machine and then we will await with interest that flight from San Rafael to San Francisco and return.

An Ancient Keynote

The keynote of the State campaign for Democratic purposes was sounded in this city last week at a pow-wow of stalwart Jeffersonian patriots, who realize that to supply them with jobs is the only way to purify the government and make the people happy. The keynote for 1910 is not unfamiliar to ears that treasure hackneyed tunes and is sweet in their capacious recesses. The inspiring refrain—Down with the railroad octopus—has been echoing in hamlet and dale, over the mountains high, along the freighted waterways and in the streets of cities almost since the last spike was driven. Of late it has been played on the soft pedal, but there is a demand for a greater volume of sound for this year of our Lord, for the job-chasers of the Democracy have been drinking deep at the founts of enthusiasm and they have resolved to stampede the enemy. At the recent pow-wow they received some good advice from Senator Sanford and Theodore Bell. Both gentlemen agreed that the railroad had a firm grasp on all the departments of government, and that it was the part of wisdom to take advantage of this circumstance. They assume that it is universally agreed that none but Democrats can make the octopus let go; also that it has been forgotten that this same consensus of opinion prevailed during the Budd campaign. Perhaps the brightest thing that was said at the pow-wow was an epigram that fell from the beautiful lips of Senator Sanford. "Stand for something," he said, "and not against everything." This sentence is a masterpiece in the rare art of compressing vast common sense into small compass. But will the Democracy of California swallow this pellet of concentrated wisdom? Not unless it is in a mood to abandon its most cherished principles. The average Democrat is instinctively against everything save that which has not been tried. He has contempt even for public office—when he is not filling one—but after available jobs he races with record breaking speed.

Stimulants to California Pride

Nearly every paper that comes out of New York nowadays has something to say about the tremendous triumph of Nance O'Neil in Dave Belasco's play "The Lily." Of all the recent productions in New York, it is said, this play and its star arrest attention and invite comment. The news of the impression made by the play and player—the latter being a Californian product and the play the product of a Californian—is naturally conducive to a thrill of pride in these parts where always persists the mood for such sensations though for years they have been somewhat commonplace. Even now we may thrill to something more than the winning of her way by Nance O'Neil and the accumulation of new honors by Dave Belasco, whose unerring instinct for popular taste has made of him the most prosperous of American play builders. Louis De Foe, critic of the World, tells us that the only thing comparable with one of Nance O'Neil's artistic transports was Tully Marshall's histronic achievement in one of the powerful climaxes of Clyde Fitch's play, "The City." Score one more for Californian talent. Tully Marshall is "a native son." He is one of the many Californians that have "made it go" in New York so many years that they have been forgotten in their own home. When he went to school in this city in the eighties he was Tully Phillips.

When he made his debut with the Jeffreys Lewis company at the old Baldwin Theatre he changed his name. After leaving this city he became a stage manager, and it was in that capacity that he visited us some years ago with Jack Barrymore. En route to this city Barrymore fell ill and Marshall jumped in at Los Angeles and played the star part, and played it so well that the critics, who did not know Marshall, paid enthusiastic tribute to the brilliant talents of young Barrymore. Marshall is one of the big hits of the current season in New York. The only other one is Nance O'Neil.

Those Wily Critics

Now that Nance O'Neil has conquested New York theatregoers the cunning critics of the metropolis are making extravagant demands on their ingenuity in their stupendous efforts to justify the opacity of their vision. When Nance O'Neil appeared in New York some years ago she was not exploited by any of the leading managers; nor was she able to surround herself with a crack company or any of the glittering and luxurious trappings that fascinate and allure. As a consequence the critics failed to perceive her merits. Allan Dale saw nothing in her but primal power. He saw fit to jibe and jeer. Now the critics affect the belief that her art has been perfected under the magic tulelage of Dave Belasco. As one of them puts it, "He swept away extravagances and mannerisms which for many years have choked her potential histrionic genius and re-established the actress where she belongs—in the very first rank of emotional artistes in her profession." The naivete of this explanation is charming. Fancy David Belasco, the trainer of Mrs. Carter, an actress who is noted for nothing so much as for her extravagances and mannerisms, refining the art of Nance O'Neil. In this connection I may be pardoned perhaps for quoting myself. In Town Talk of December 20, 1902, the following comments were made anent the failure of Nance O'Neil in London and her performance of "Elizabeth" at the Grand Opera House in this city: "One wonders why this great artist failed to make good in London. The only plausible explanation is that London theatregoers are no quicker to recognize genius than we are to discern mediocrity when it comes to us cleverly press-agented. Nance O'Neil is bound to achieve her due some day. . . . There is not an English-speaking woman on the stage today capable of such an artistic performance of such a difficult role as that which Nance O'Neil has been giving at the Grand this week."

She—Mother is growing so stout that she reminds me of a balloon.

He—Yes, but she grows less and less dirigible.

At Funerals or Anywhere Else—

There is one public official who will devote little time to worrying over the changes which the new dispensation will make in the personnel of job-holders and that is Joe Leggett, the police commissioner. Leggett is as bountifully supplied with whiskers as the retiring mayor, but that is not his only claim to distinction. He is also noted as the man who has been talking, thinking, writing and dreaming single tax since the man who winds the ferry clock was a babe in arms. Holding office is only a side issue with Leggett; his serious purpose in life is to convince a yawning world that Henry George was the apostle of a new faith and to convert all who will listen to the tenets of that faith. Which reminds me of a story. (That is merely a form of speech—I intended to tell this story when I started.) Once upon a time Joe Leggett was at a funeral service over the body of a friend. The service took place in an undertaker's establishment. The officiating clergyman had not been acquainted with the deceased and he therefore suggested that some one of the mourners say a few words. There was no response. He repeated the suggestion and presently a gentleman with a long gray beard—Joe Leggett, no less—arose and slowly and mournfully walked to the clergyman's side. Resting one hand on the coffin he looked up with a sad countenance and began: "Since no one in all this throng has seen fit to say a few kind words above our departed friend, I feel that I would be untrue to myself were I to let this occasion pass without saying something to you on the subject of single tax."

Will Hearst Run for Governor?

While William R. Hearst has been in this city approving plans for his skyscraper and preparing to rebuild his old Sausalito home with a view to an ultimate return to residence in this State, his followers in New York have just accomplished the tremendous job of regaining control of the Independence League. It will be recalled that the Tammany men, by what they called strategy and the Hearstlings called theft, took the organization, its emblem and its column on the official ballot away from Hearst at the primaries last fall. Having no further use for the league, Tammany allowed Hearst to have it back; so, when a meeting for the purpose of reorganizing was held a few days ago, not a Tammany man attended and the recapture of the league was accomplished by default. It was announced that the league would put a full ticket in the field at the gubernatorial election next fall and already there is talk that Hearst will have another whirl at the governorship. If he does so, he will undoubtedly obtain a big following of voters; for he won great prestige during the recent campaign and would overlook no opportunity of making capital with the upstate farmers out of his attack on Tammany. That Hearst's following is largely personal must be conceded, for without him the league would amount to nothing. He cannot transfer his strength to any of the Shearns or Hisgens by whom he is surrounded. That is one reason why he will probably go on the ticket. There are five hundred other reasons, all sufficient in the mind of Hearst.

A Henley Poem by Request

An Alameda woman who describes herself as an "old subscriber" to Town Talk requests that we publish the poem from which Crichton in Barrie's play, "The Admirable Crichton," quotes with such telling effect. The poem has been published before in this paper but we are pleased to oblige by giving it again. It is to be found in the works of William Ernest Henley and reads as follows:

Or ever the knightly years were gone
With the old world to the grave,
I was a King in Babylon
And you were a Christian Slave.

I saw, I took, I cast you by,
I bent and broke your pride.
You loved me well, or I heard them lie,
But your longing was denied.
Surely I knew that by and by
You cursed your gods and died.

And a myriad suns have set and shone
Since then upon the grave
Decreed by the King in Babylon
To her that had been his slave.

The pride I trampled is now my scathe,
For it tramples me again.
The old resentment lasts like death,
For you love, yet you refrain.
I break my heart on your hard unfaith,
And I break my heart in vain.

Yet not for an hour do I wish undone
The deed beyond the grave,
When I was a King in Babylon
And you were a Virgin Slave

Is Macdonald Alive?

A Californian who recently returned from abroad brought with him an interesting story about Sir Hector Macdonald of South African fame who is generally believed to have committed suicide in a Paris hotel. The Californian while in Paris spent some time at the hotel where the suicide occurred, and there he was told that it was not Macdonald but another man who had killed himself. Some months later the Californian visited the town in Scotland where Macdonald's body is believed to be entombed, and there he learned that the suspicions of the people had been aroused by the manner in which thé funeral was conducted. The people had expected to attend the funeral, but the body arrived before daybreak and was rushed to the cemetery and quickly put out of sight. Now this is not the first time that question has been raised with reference to the story of Macdonald's death. A year ago I heard the story of a merchant who, while visiting Pekin, recognized Macdonald on the parade ground in the garb of a Chinese soldier. He was well acquainted with the Afghan hero, and he approached him and spoke to him, but was immediately hustled off the ground. Macdonald, it may be remembered, at the time his death was reported, was on his way to England where he was to be tried for misconduct, the charge having been made against him that he was addicted to infamous practices. In the circumstances it is not at all improbable that the British Government, to avert a great army scandal, made it possible for him to lose his identity in the army of China. It it known that the Government offered Oscar Wilde facilities to escape from London just before the trial of the libel suit that brought disgrace upon him. Paris is singularly fertile in stories akin to this one about Macdonald. Oscar Wilde died in Paris, and is buried there, but it has been said that he is still alive and that he is now in a monastery. It has been asserted that Marshal Ney was spirited off to this country and also Louis XVII, while the escape of Louis Napoleon from the fortress of Ham, when a dummy was placed on his prison cot, is a matter of history. The journalists of Paris have a strong fancy for yarns of this character.

Miss Izetta Jewell on Broadway

Those who remember Miss Izetta Jewell as the leading lady of Frank Bacon's stock company at the Colonial Theatre in McAllister street will be surprised to learn that she has just made her debut on Broadway as the chief support of Otis Skinner in a new play by Booth Tarkington and Harry Leon Wilson. The latest work of these collaborators who scored such a success in their "Man from Home" is called "Your Humble Servant" and deals with the ups and downs of a theatrical road company. Miss Jewell plays the part of the leading woman of the company who is the ward of the manager, an upright character enacted by Otis Skinner. The leading woman is loved by a wealthy youth who joins the company to be near her, but the hardships of one-night stands and subsequent poverty in New York cool his ardor and enable the actress to discover that her guardian cherishes a pure and steadfast attachment. In the end she achieves a great metropolitan triumph, her latent talent manifesting itself as the result of her guardian's unwearied coaching. Miss Izetta Jewell has had her share of disagreeable adventures in barnstorming and if her success on Broadway is in any way comparable with that of the character she plays, the drama will be a curious parallel of her stage life. When she was with Frank Bacon she manifested considerable talent for light roles but lacked emotional depth. Nobody at that time would have suspected that her histrionic qualities were such as to make her a satisfactory leading woman for Otis Skinner.

A Preacher on Jeffries

A Methodist preacher of Patterson, New Jersey, has made a new pulpit record by advertising a sermon on the ultra-theological theme, "Can Jeffries Come Back?" and then expatiating on it to a crowded congregation of regular pewholders, touts, gamblers, trainers, pugilists and other thirsters for spiritual uplift. From one view point the Sabbath services were a great success for the sporting confraternity, always liberal tippers, responded generously to the appeal of the contribution plate. But as far as any definite knowledge was concerned the sermon was a failure and it is reported that many members of the congregation muttered "stung" as they emerged into the outer air of Patterson. The sermon made one fact clear and that is that the Methodist preacher has received no inside information from on high regarding the outcome of the Jeffries-Johnson fight. Whether or not the sports expected that he would get a message from above is a matter of considerable doubt, but the size of their contributions indicated that some such idea abided with them. Their disappointment must have been keen when they found themselves compelled to listen to a sermon dealing particularly with the combat of David and Goliath and only slightly tinged with applicability to the coming contest of the black and the white fighter.

Some Pulpit Language

The spectacle of a man of God seriously expatiating on the merits of two bruisers for the edification of a throng of worshipers is not likely to enthuse those who are seeking for some method of endearing religion to the masses, but it certainly is entertaining and, after all, entertainment is what many preachers are most anxious to provide for their flocks. No doubt many a man who hugs his pillow of a Sunday morning would hie him to church if he could be sure that he would hear such language as this of the Patterson preacher: "Jeffries won the belt and much lucre and then stepped out of the ring to have a good time and enjoy himself, and for five years, like Sampson with his head in the lap of Delilah, Jeffries has slept with his head in the lap of a luxurious and bibulous life. While he has slept a big black gorilla has come into the ring" and so on. But the man who routed laziness in favor of church would not fool himself with the delusion that he was going to divine service, unless he were hypocritically inclined. He would admit to his conscience that such sermonizing had the charm of the sporting page set off by the novelty of the surroundings. Moreover, if the man were skilled in sporting matters, he would soon tire of sermons on pugilism unless the preacher showed a closer acquaintance with facts. He would know that Jeffries has not slept for five years in the lap of luxury and bibulosity, for Jeffries has been unusually temperate.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Probably the chief factor in shaping the course of prices in the recent week has been the Rock Island affair which upset the financial community here more than generally believed. The President's message and high money rates were also used by market manipulators to create some public liquidation. Steel common has been dealt in heavily, aggregating over one million shares in four days and a variation in price of about 2 per cent. The selling has been notoriously good but the closing price for the week shows tremendous accumulation by important interests. The President's message has been well received and is apparently satisfactory in the main to leading bankers. The coming message on Monday will undoubtedly be of the same tenor. We look very favorably to the future of the security market and believe that a higher range of values will be seen in the coming three months.

Wheat—Argentina's crop estimate at less than last year was the dominating influence on the wheat market this week. Liverpool showed deep concern over this news, and there has been good buying of both Canadian and Pacific Coast wheat; the flour trade from the Atlantic Coast has been good. Speculative sentiment has been further stimulated by the domestic situation. We enter the new year with the second smallest visible in a generation, and on population basis, the smallest of record. Receipts have been retarded by the excessive cold weather and it will take some weeks of heavy receipts to replace supplies. We are now entering the period of declining stocks and the outlook from the best imaginable movement is for a constant pressure on the supplies which means higher prices. The American farmer has a notion that he will get last spring's prices, which will retard deliveries and tend to advance prices. The outlook, therefore, favors purchases on all breaks and with Friday's weakness puts wheat on a good buying level.

Corn is going forward to the prices of two years ago, and they will be made before the final month, as the holder of the grain is convinced that the year is destined to make record prices for his crop. The cold weather, while it has retarded deliveries, has not improved quality. The corn now available for market was shelled in a damp condition and cannot improve, as few have facilities for turning the grain. The unhusked corn in the fields has undoubtedly improved, but it cannot be gathered until the weather becomes favorable. The big movement of corn has been transferred to a period when supplies will be exhausted in importing sections of the country and distribution will be unusually active. Under such conditions, corn has always advanced, and there is no reason to expect a reversal. The market is exceptionally strong and a higher level will be reached before there can be an important break to reinstate. Scale buying is advisable under present market conditions and prospects.

Cotton—The much looked for period of manipulation in the cotton market appears to have at last arrived. Fluctuations of one hundred points a day now seem as common as those of fifteen and twenty points a few weeks ago. The United States Census Bureau makes the total amount of cotton ginned to January 1, 9,646,285 bales against 12,465,298 bales to January 1 last year and 9,951,505 to the corresponding date in 1908. The old argument that a greater percentage of this year's crop was ginned by the end of December this season than ever before, has come into play again, and it is probably so. Up to January 1 of last year 95.3 per cent of the crop had been ginned. This year it is expected that all but a very small fraction of the total growth, exclusive of linters, has been accounted for and even though there be no greater percentage ginned than last year the census figures just about confirm the Agricultural Department's small crop estimate for a growth of 10,088,000 bales. There is no appreciable change in the situation and there are no unfavorable features other than the impending important election scheduled for the United Kingdom the latter part of this month. Meanwhile nervous and excited markets are likely to continue.

Copper—Statistics and estimates by the United States Geological Survey from all plants known to produce blister copper from domestic ores and from all Lake mines indicate that the copper output from mines in the United States in 1909 surpassed all previous records. The increase was approximately about 18 per cent and the demand was greater, there being a considerable increase in the demand for the same abroad, especially in Germany. The result is that there is growing in the market a firmer tone. All the leading producing and selling companies are quoting copper at 13¾ cents, while some transactions were reported at 13⅞ cents. One of the largest and most conservative handlers of copper in New York City expresses the opinion that during the next few months the demand from both home and abroad will be heavy and that the price of the metal will reach 15 cents by April 1. We certainly look for a big improvement in prices during the year 1910, based upon business activity and prosperity such as this country has never seen before. This means much better prices for copper stocks, but we would advise great caution in selecting purchases and buy only those of proven value, with excellent management discriminating between those with real merit, good backing and careful and experienced management, and those stocks put on the market for purely speculative purposes, or by men of no standing. Last week, on the renewed rumor of an announcement of the plans of the contemplated merger, many specialists in coppers were induced to buy exclusively Amalgamated, Anaconda, Tennessee and Utah as well as American Smelting issues and when it was ascertained beyond dispute that a conference was being held in the offices of J. P. Morgan & Co. on the most advantageous way to consummate the final consolidation of the Amalgamated, Guggenheim, Cole-Ryan, and Hayden, Stone & Co's red metal properties and smelters, the purchasing of these coppers was augmented materially. Our opinion in regard to the merits of Nevada Con-

Local Securities—The feature of the past week's dealings in local stocks and bonds was the movement in Spring Valley Water stock. While the agitation in labor circles against the acquisition of the Spring Valley plant has not lessened any, it has been somewhat offset by a campaign of education by the local press and many prominent citizens. In view of this, Spring Valley stock has recovered about half of its recent decline and is not for sale in such large quantities as it was last week. Alaska Packers has been another strong spot and, on the talk of a six per cent dividend basis for it at the annual meeting which occurs shortly, has risen to high records on this move. Associated Oil has been very quiet and weaker if anything, though there has been absolutely no fresh developments on it. Hawiian Sugar stocks are putting forth a very firm front and on the prospects of a very profitable season at the plantations, are daily increasing in value with Hawaiian Commercial, Makaweli, Onomea and Paauhau the most favored. Trading in the balance of the local stocks has been tame and without much change, outside of a slight heaviness in Pacific Telephone and Pacific Gas issues, which is attributed to the general slump in the New York Stock market. Bond dealings have been fairly large without any important fluctuations, the main activity being in Associated Oil 5s, California Gas and Electric 5s, City Electric 5s, Los Angeles Railway 5s, Pacific Railway 5s, Pacific Telephone 5s, Peoples Water 5s, Powell Street Railway 6s, Key Route first 5s, Southern Pacific refunding 4s, Spring Valley 4s and United Railroads 4s. It is said that purchases of Pacific Gas and Electric, common and preferred, are timely as well as of Alaska Packers, which stock is tipped for par, or higher during the year. Associated Oil is thought to be a buy on any weakness and some of the higher class Hawaiian Sugars are picked for much higher prices.

The Knot

(Among the things that Peary brought back from the Pole was a knot's nest. The knot lives in the Arctic regions only, and is the rarest of birds. The only known specimen is in the museum at St. Petersburg.)

You have probably heard
Of that notable bird
The knot.
Its food, so they say,
Must be highly frappe,
Not hot.
It finds ices and snow—
Why, I can't understand—
To be quite comme il faut
And the colder the brand
The tighter the knot will grow
Tied to the land
On hand.

The long winter night
Is a source of delight
To the knot.
It warbles away
Till the coming of day
In its grot.
And when the sun rises
The knot slips up too.
And then—such surprises!—
A hullabaloo
From the knot of small kittlets begot!
Hear them coo.
Atchoo!

Atchoo twice and thrice!
I've a cold. Sure, to splice
The knot
Is a hazardous thing,
So I'll cease now to sing.
I forgot
To add, if you doubt
My aim single and sole
Is to help science sprout,
Why, then sail to the goal.
And there—or I'm out—
You will find a knot hole
In the pole!

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Probably the chief factor in shaping the course of prices in the recent week has been the Rock Island affair which upset the financial community here more than generally believed. The President's message and high money rates were also used by market manipulators to create some public liquidation. Steel common has been dealt in heavily, aggregating over one million shares in four days and a variation in price of about 2 per cent. The selling has been notoriously good but the closing price for the week shows tremendous accumulation by important interests. The President's message has been well received and is apparently satisfactory in the main to leading bankers. The coming message on Monday will undoubtedly be of the same tenor. We look very favorably to the future of the security market and believe that a higher range of values will be seen in the coming three months.

Wheat—Argentina's crop estimate at less than last year was the dominating influence on the wheat market this week. Liverpool showed deep concern over this news, and there has been good buying of both Canadian and Pacific Coast wheat; the flour trade from the Atlantic Coast has been good. Speculative sentiment has been further stimulated by the domestic situation. We enter the new year with the second smallest visible in a generation, and on population basis, the smallest of record. Receipts have been retarded by the excessive cold weather and it will take some weeks of heavy receipts to replace supplies. We are now entering the period of declining stocks and the outlook from the best imaginable movement is for a constant pressure on the supplies which means higher prices. The American farmer has a notion that he will get last spring's prices, which will retard deliveries and tend to advance prices. The outlook, therefore, favors purchases on all breaks and with Friday's weakness puts wheat on a good buying level.

Corn is going forward to the prices of two years ago, and they will be made before the final month, as the holder of the grain is convinced that the year is destined to make record prices for his crop. The cold weather, while it has retarded deliveries, has not improved quality. The corn now available for market was shelled in a damp condition and cannot improve, as few have facilities for turning the grain. The unhusked corn in the fields has undoubtedly improved, but it cannot be gathered until the weather becomes favorable. The big movement of corn has been transferred to a period when supplies will be exhausted in importing sections of the country and distribution will be unusually active. Under such conditions, corn has always advanced, and there is no reason to expect a reversal. The market is exceptionally strong and a higher level will be reached before there can be an important break to reinstate. Scale buying is advisable under present market conditions and prospects.

Cotton—The much looked for period of manipulation in the cotton market appears to have at last arrived. Fluctuations of one hundred points a day now seem as common as those of fifteen and twenty points a few weeks ago. The United States Census Bureau makes the total amount of cotton ginned to January 1, 9,646,285 bales against 12,465,298 bales to January 1 last year and 9,951,505 to the corresponding date in 1908. The old argument that a greater percentage of this year's crop was ginned by the end of December this season than ever before, has come into play again, and it is probably so. Up to January 1 of last year 95.3 per cent of the crop had been ginned. This year it is expected that all but a very small fraction of the total growth, exclusive of linters, has been accounted for and even though there be no greater percentage ginned than last year the census figures just about confirm the Agricultural Department's small crop estimate for a growth of 10,088,000 bales. There is no appreciable change in the situation and there are no unfavorable features other than the impending important election scheduled for the United Kingdom the latter part of this month. Meanwhile nervous and excited markets are likely to continue.

Copper—Statistics and estimates by the United States Geological Survey from all plants known to produce blister copper from domestic ores and from all Lake mines indicate that the copper output from mines in the United States in 1909 surpassed all previous records. The increase was approximately about 18 per cent and the demand was greater, there being a considerable increase in the demand for the same abroad, especially in Germany. The result is that there is growing in the market a firmer tone. All the leading producing and selling companies are quoting copper at 13¾ cents, while some transactions were reported at 13⅞ cents. One of the largest and most conservative handlers of copper in New York City expresses the opinion that during the next few months the demand from both home and abroad will be heavy and that the price of the metal will reach 15 cents by April 1. We certainly look for a big improvement in prices during the year 1910, based upon business activity and prosperity such as this country has never seen before. This means much better prices for copper stocks, but we would advise great caution in selecting purchases and buy only those of proven value, with excellent management, discriminating between those with real merit, good backing and careful and experienced management, and those stocks put on the market for purely speculative purposes, or by men of no standing. Last week, on the renewed rumor of an announcement of the plans of the contemplated merger, many specialists in coppers were induced to buy exclusively Amalgamated, Anaconda, Tennessee and Utah as well as American Smelting issues and when it was ascertained beyond dispute that a conference was being held in the offices of J. P. Morgan & Co. on the most advantageous way to consummate the final consolidation of the Amalgamated, Guggenheim, Cole-Ryan, and Hayden, Stone & Co's red metal properties and smelters, the purchasing of these coppers was augmented materially. Our opinion in regard to the merits of Nevada Con-

Local Securities—The feature of the past week's dealings in local stocks and bonds was the movement in Spring Valley Water stock. While the agitation in labor circles against the acquisition of the Spring Valley plant has not lessened any, it has been somewhat offset by a campaign of education by the local press and many prominent citizens. In view of this, Spring Valley stock has recovered about half of its recent decline and is not for sale in such large quantities as it was last week. Alaska Packers has been another strong spot and, on the talk of a six per cent dividend basis for it at the annual meeting which occurs shortly, has risen to high records on this move. Associated Oil has been very quiet and weaker if anything, though there has been absolutely no fresh developments on it. Hawaiian Sugar stocks are putting forth a very firm front and on the prospects of a very profitable season at the plantations, are daily increasing in value with Hawaiian Commercial, Makaweli, Onomea and Paauhau the most favored. Trading in the balance of the local stocks has been tame and without much change, outside of a slight heaviness in Pacific Telephone and Pacific Gas issues, which is attributed to the general slump in the New York Stock market. Bond dealings have been fairly large without any important fluctuations, the main activity being in Associated Oil 5s, California Gas and Electric 5s, City Electric 5s, Los Angeles Railway 5s, Pacific Railway 5s, Pacific Telephone 5s, Peoples Water 5s, Powell Street Railway 6s, Key Route first 5s, Southern Pacific refunding 4s, Spring Valley 4s and United Railroads 4s. It is said that purchases of Pacific Gas and Electric, common and preferred, are timely as well as of Alaska Packers, which stock is tipped for par, or higher, during the year. Associated Oil is thought to be a buy on any weakness and some of the higher class Hawaiian Sugars are picked for much higher prices.

The Knot

(Among the things that Peary brought back from the Pole was a knot's nest. The knot lives in the Arctic regions only, and is the rarest of birds. The only known specimen is in the museum at St. Petersburg.)

You have probably heard
Of that notable bird
The knot.
Its food, so they say,
Must be highly frappe,
Not hot.
It finds ices and snow—
Why, I can't understand—
To be quite comme il faut.
And the colder the brand
The tighter the knot will grow
Tied to the land
On hand.

The long winter night
Is a source of delight
To the knot.
It warbles away
Till the coming of day
In its grot.
And when the sun rises
The knot slips up too.
And then—such surprises!—
A hullabaloo
From the knot of small knotlets begot!
Hear them coo.
Atchoo!

Atchoo twice and thrice!
I've a cold. Sure, to splice
The knot
Is a hazardous thing,
So I'll cease now to sing.
I forgot
To add, if you doubt
My aim single and sole
Is to help science sprout,
Why, then sail to the goal,
And there—or I'm out—
You will find a knot hole
In the pole!

Mrs. Williams' Aviation Bonnet

Nothing about the opening of the Columbia Theatre on Monday night rivaled in attractive power for feminine eyes the aviation bonnet which Mrs. Thomas H. Williams wore. Half the audience kept its gaze on the bonnet all evening. Not even the big kohinoor that blazes in the blue dome above could distract their attention. Decidedly it is the most startlingly original thing which has come out of Paris in a long time, and Mrs. Williams will always have the distinction of being the first with sufficient courage to wear it. Mrs. Williams sat in a fine position to exhibit her fad, occupying the first lower box at the right with her sister, Miss Muriel Steele, her mother, Mrs. E. L. G. Steele, Mrs. Florence Porter Pfingst, Frank Michels and Mr. Williams. If you turn to the pages in your old English history where the wives of Henry VIII are pictured you will find a print of Catherine of Aragon and her daughter Mary of Tudor, both wearing bonnets exactly like the one which amazed the audience at the Columbia on Monday night. They call it the "aviation bonnet" in Paris but it is simply a hood covering all of the hair except a fringe of the bangs. It is tied on with long streamers of black tulle that reach below the knees. Mrs. Williams' bonnet was made of pale blue ribbed satin, pleated regularly and made over a sort of hood outline, the pleats extending down the sides, with a back piece also of the pleated satin. It is outlined in old gold bullion braid, made in Etruscan design, and at the left side perks a bunch of black aigrettes.

Fashionables at the Aviation Meet

There was a decided scarcity of society folk among the earliest San Francisco visitors to the aviation meet at Los Angeles. Mr. Wakefield Baker arrived with a party before the meet began and registered at the Alexandria. So did Mr. Wickham Havens, Mr. Frank Havens and Mr. Harold Havens with their wives. Willie O'Connor was much in evidence but Willie's excursions nowadays, in these strenuous times of champagne competition, have ever a professional purpose. Willie was in Los Angeles to sell wine. Walter Martin was an enthusiastic and frequent visitor to the aviation field at Dominguez. Why more of the exclusive and moneyed herd were not in evidence at the beginning of the meet I cannot explain. Many no doubt saw the Rheims or some other European meet and are surfeited with aviation. In other words they are too blase to take part in one of the greatest events in the history of California.

The Dog As a Bit of Apparel

To any one who doubts the endless entertainment in the passing show let me recommend the mere detail of the fashions. Approached in the proper spirit they must offer divertissement for the most blase. For instance, this week we are told that in London dogs must match gowns and furs. Women having no dogs in fashionable tints, rent them. Consider the possibilities. Why stop at dogs? Why not reckon with the complexion of husbands in choosing frocks,—old blue to be worn with blond and blue-eyed men while unrelieved black would be striking with the dark Italian type; and what could be more distinguished looking than a handsome woman in an evening gown of gray and glittering steel sequins accompanied by a husband whose own gray hair and mustache strike just the correct note in the ensemble? The idea is truly capable of development. But to return to dogs. Several San Francisco women have adopted the mode. Mrs. Fred Palmer recently returned from Europe with a set of sables and a Pommeranian to match them. She has been a conspicuous figure at afternoon affairs with the tiny brown dog under her arm, his head resting comfortably on a huge muff. Last season Mrs. George Cadwalader made a pretty picture in a white suit with white fox furs accompanied by her fluffy white Spitz, who however did not attend teas with his mistress after the manner of the more fashionable Pom. It is impossible to resist a few suggestions. White fox terriers require ermine, and women appearing with collies should wear brown fox, preferably with brown velvet. The black pony coats of the hour may result in a revival of the long-haired water spaniel, one of the old fashioned dogs whose decorative value is not properly appreciated.

The "Smart" Thousand

Shortly after the inauguration of President Taft it was reported in these columns that the President's wife was a woman of social ambition and that she purposed reorganizing the fashionable herd of Washington. Now comes to me from the nation's capital the news that the social plans of the first lady of the land have been matured, and that under the name of the "Assembly Set" the smart sets of Washington, New York and Philadelphia will be fused into a body not exceeding a thousand families. In this process the now historic "Four Hundred" will be wiped out. I am told that this movement is looked upon favorably by the New Yorkers on account of the way that divorce and other things have played havoc with the original membership. There is absolutely no intention to ignore other cities except geographically. In the opinion of those behind the movement, every social leader of the country maintains a residence in either Philadelphia, Washington or New York, and this will be sufficient qualification for membership. Membership under the new order of things will not be limited to a person, so far as numerical strength goes, but to one family. An attempt will be made whereby an outsider can be made eligible through marriage of one of the members, provided the union is of such character as to make this advisable. There are as many men interested in this movement as there are women—men who are renowned throughout the country for what they do in politics and other fields—and this promises, according to the sponsors for the movement, a total elimination of the snobbish rich. The first cause that brought about the consideration of this step was the hesitation of a New Yorker, for instance, to receive a member of Washington's or Boston's or Cincinnati's smart set as freely as he would one of the Four Hundred. According to the articles of the new set, which will be informally ratified by the White House and the exclusive leaders of those cities, a person recognized by the Assembly will be eligible to all the honors and courtesies, no matter what city he visits, provided there is a member of the Assembly at such place.

The West To Be Recognized

Rank, birth and wealth will be but relative qualifications for membership in the new set. Rank will be more valuable than birth, according to the promoters of the movement. They include birth as a categorical qualification in order to embrace those families who have achieved no especial rank or wealth to justify their coming under these headings. Wealth alone will not be considered. That money, nevertheless, is not an unnecessary item is made plain by the drain of expenses that membership in this set will demand. There have been some protests by ultra-exclusivists against a membership of one thousand families. They believe that this will average well over three thousand persons, but the opponents are a small minority. The principles upon which the leaders backing this movement operate declare that a safe estimate of general society people throughout the country will place the number at forty thousand, and reducing this to a common plane on the ratio of one to forty is not to be objected to. There are others who believe that the final ballot, which is to determine the list by which the White House and all the who's who families will regulate themselves and their functions, may have to be doubled in number. Washington believes that there will be a great howl following this winnowing out of many rabid social families. In most cases, it is said, protests and objections will be overlooked as insignificant, both because the Assembly is to be a national set socially prominent and entirely dissociated from the traditional sets made popular in fiction or otherwise, and the White House might officially step on the toe of some howling political dervish whose daughters make him cantakerous and whose wife drives him to desperation. Those who are left out may not know it for many months. In the new arrangement the West will not be ignored. The Crockers will certainly have the entree and there is a possibility of Mrs. Eleanor Martin being admitted on the strength of her army connections and her acquaintance with ex-President Roosevelt's married daughter. In planning the new Assembly perhaps not one-fourth of the Four Hundred will be given a place. This assertion, already current in high society, has reached the ears of some who believe themselves doomed to exclusion, with a resultant antagonism on their part and expressions of derision at the new order of things. It seems that the promoters of the Assembly unite in the belief that the Four Hundred and similar sets in other cities have outgrown themselves by intermarriage and a too far-fetched loftiness, which has removed them from the interesting side of the world. Sectarianism and religion will not be factors in the new Assembly. Divorce, too, will not be negatively looked upon, provided there have been no doubtful circumstances attending it. There are many divorcees already listed for membership, as there are many families which believe them-

May Wed Unexpectedly

There is a rumor that the wedding of Mrs. Frank Norris and Frank Preston is to take place in the very near future. Mrs. Norris is visiting her fiance's sister, Mrs. Willard Drown, and it is surmised, hinted and whispered that she will not return to her Santa Barbara home until the ceremony has taken place. Both Mrs. Norris and Mr. Preston beam pleasantly but non-committally when questioned about their plans. Mrs. Norris says, "It is all very vague" and Mr. Preston says, "Ask Mrs. Norris." The trivial conventionalities have never worried Mrs. Norris and her friends would not be surprised any day to hear that she and Mr. Preston had unexpectedly and informally been wedded and departed on a honeymoon. Meanwhile they are being joyously entertained. Mrs. Drown gave a tea for her prospective sister-in-law and Mrs. Worthington Ames hostessed a dinner in her honor. Both Mrs. Drown and Mrs. Ames are delighted with the match, and Mrs. Preston-to-be who has never cared for society, will find herself identified with the frivolous set after her marriage.

The Sprightly Countess Cassini

A correspondent writes me from Paris that the Countess Cassini, once the bosom friend of "Princess Alice" and for several years the subject of spirited gossip in Washington, is about to make her debut in grand opera. The Countess is a most vivacious and charmingly unconventional woman. She came to this country twelve years ago as the head of the household of her uncle, the Russian Ambassador, Count Arthur Cassini. She was then only seventeen years of age, but she was even then very attractive to gay bachelors. At an age when most girls are still in the school room she possessed remarkable beauty and fascination and had all the graces of a woman of the world. Her vogue was immediate and wide. Among those with whom she became a great favorite was Mrs. McKinley, who soon evinced an unusual fondness for the young Russian girl's company. After the accession of President Roosevelt, Countess Marguerite's social sway was even more marked, for she became one of the close friends of the President's daughter, Alice. The two were inseparable and Countess Marguerite was credited with having great influence with Miss Roosevelt. From the first her position among the matrons of the diplomatic set was a difficult one. They resented being obliged to pay her the attentions due a mistress of the Russian Embassy, objecting because she was neither the wife nor the daughter of an Ambassador. This difficulty was somewhat obviated when Count Cassini legally adopted her as his daughter, and when it was announced that the Czar had given her the title of Countess in her own right. With resident and official society Countess Marguerite was enormously popular. With Miss Roosevelt and Miss Isabel May she was one of a dashing trio whose doings were matters of interest to hosts of admirers. She entertained frequently, and the rumors of her engagement were almost as numerous as those which concerned Miss Alice Roosevelt. Representative Nicholas Longworth, before the announcement of his engagement to the President's daughter, was said to be a suitor for the hand of Countess Marguerite.

A Social Feud

The family of Sir Mortimer Durand, former British Ambassador, were social opponents of Countess Cassini, and the warfare they instituted on the dashing little chatelaine of the Czar's Embassy was said to be largely responsible for Count Cassini's transfer to the post at Madrid, to which he is now accredited. With the Durands the Countess was decidedly persona non grata, and this fact caused a social feud. Many, fearing to incur the displeasure of so powerful a personage as a British Ambassador, fled the standard of the Countess, who, however, continued to lead her cohorts with brilliancy and address. So long as Miss Alice Roosevelt remained her chum her victory seemed assured, but their friendship was ultimately broken, it was said, at the express instance of the former President. After that the Countess was no longer accounted a leader, and it soon began to be rumored that Cassini would be transferred to Madrid. Then came the rumor that the Court of Spain, one of the strictest in all Europe, would not receive the Countess Cassini. This report was followed by the announcement that Countess Cassini intended to make her home with friends in Paris, and that her uncle would proceed to Madrid without her. Last summer it was reported that Countess Cassini would marry Alec Moseley, a wealthy Richmond man.

Two Families To Be Reunited

None of the bavardes who have been discussing the engagement of Miss Genevieve Walker, the granddaughter of Mrs. Eleanor Martin, to "Billy" Burke, the son of Richard Burke of Dublin, have noticed the curious manner in which this marriage will cement the relationship of the families. Richard Burke of Dublin married a Miss Donohue who was a cousin of the daughter of Peter Donohoe who became the Baroness von Schroeder. Mrs. Eleanor Martin is the sister of Miss Anne Donohoe who became Peter Donohoe's second wife. Miss Walker

So the engagement of the young couple presents a curious study for those who are patient enough to figure out what is their kinship to each other.

An Interesting Engagement in Ithaca

An engagement which will interest many people in this city is that of Miss Bernice Drucker Wilson to Robert Schurman which was announced in Ithaca, New York, a few days ago. Miss Wilson is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Wilson of this city while Mr. Schurman is the eldest son of Jacob Gould Schurman, president of Cornell University. Miss Wilson is the sister of Mrs. Claude H. Smith of Ithaca and it was at the home of Mrs. Smith that the engagement was formally announced. Miss Wilson's father is a well known real estate man of this city. Young Schurman is a graduate of Cornell and is in the employ of the Standard Oil Company. He will go to China in the interests of the company and is now on his way to this city. The romance of the young couple sprang from the visit of Miss Wilson to her sister in Ithaca.

Mrs. Atherton's Former Play

Those who have read with interest that Mrs. Atherton is engaged on two dramas for Mrs. Fiske may not know that this is not her first excursion into the field of play writing. Several years ago she dramatized her novel, "A Daughter of the Vine," for Olga Nethersole, the actress helping with the scenario. Miss Nethersole was anxious at the same time that Mrs. Atherton should dramatize "Senator North," but the novelist declined. She regarded that book as the least fitted of all her works for stage presentation owing to its analytical and introspective character.

The Coming Trio Recitals

The three trio recitals by Mrs. Oscar Mansfeldt, piano, Signor de Grassi, violin, and Mr. Villalpando, cello, are announced for Monday evening, January 24, Thursday evening, February 17 and Thursday evening, March 17, at the new and comfortable Kohler and Chase Hall at 40 O'Farrell street. The personnel of the trio calls for little comment. Mrs. Mansfeldt has long stood at the head of piano ensemble here. Signor de Grassi has had honors abroad for his ensemble as well as his solo work, having been invited by the great Joseph Joachim to play in a quartette before the Emperor of Germany and the entire royal family. Mr. Villalpando was long a member of the well-known quartette at Washington, D. C. Trios by Smetana, Dvorak, Sinding, Saint-Saens, and others are promised, as well as solos at each concert. At the first recital, Signor de Grassi will give a group of violin numbers. Subscription tickets are $2.50 for the series and $1.00 for single admission. These may be secured from Madame de Grassi at 130 Presidio avenue. The patronesses and patrons who have made the giving of these concerts possible are: Mr. Beylard, Mrs. J. J. Brice, Mrs. Frank Lampson Brown, Mrs. George Caswell, Mrs. C. W. Clarke, Mrs. Wm. H. Crocker, Mrs. Clinton Day, Mrs. Tirey L. Ford, Dr. Arnold Genthe, Mrs. Wm. Palace to Serve After Theatre Supper

The announcement that the Palace has inaugurated an after theatre supper service in the Men's Grill room has had the effect of filling that delightful place each evening with the after theatre crowd. An orchestra plays in the grill which, while devoted exclusively to men during the day, throws back its doors to the ladies after nine-thirty. When the great glass doors opening into the beautiful Court are all thrown back in the evening the Grill becomes almost a part of the Court itself, partaking of its life and gaiety. This movement on the part of the Palace is one which is greatly appreciated by the society folk of the city.

Recent arrivals at Hotel del Portal included: Robert Elmore of Halsey & Co., New York, A. Mack of San Francisco and a party of six, Charleton C. Gunst, Leon Guggenheim Jr., J. L. Lilienthal, Louis Sloss Jr., L. Gerstle Mack, Robert Keshland, Mrs. Sophia Luenthal, Dr. and Mrs. Max. Rothschild, Mrs. Henry Lunde Jr., Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Kimble, Wallace W. Everett, editor of the Pioneer Western Lumberman, Mr. and Mrs. M. C. Sloss and family, Mr. and Mrs. C. N. Walters and family, Mr. and Mrs. S. L. Goldstein and Mr. and Mrs. Hart.

The Modest Maid

"He told me," said the modest maid,
"I was the pearl of pearls;
My charms displayed would overshade
Ten thousand other girls.
He vowed I was his cherished prize,
His goddess, his delight;
He praised my eyes more blue than skies,
Their glance than gems more bright.

"He swore gold glittered in my hair;
No words could tell my worth;
He called me fair beyond compare
With anything on earth."
"And trust you," said the matron wise,
"In what he says to you?"
From the maid's eyes shone sweet surprise:
"Of course! I know it's true."

A Spanish Lesson

Here I am a school teacher.

Ivonne, a sweet, fair creature, said to me: "I would like to learn Spanish. Your language is as melodious as music, and I would feel very happy if I could speak it like you."

"Nothing can be easier," said I, "and since your wish is a command to me, we shall begin the work whenever you like; but only on a certain condition."

"What is that?" she demanded.

"You must begin by learning the name of every part of the body: eyes, cheek, lips, eyelashes, hands, mouth, and so forth. I will tell you their equivalents in Spanish, and in order that you may not forget the lesson, I will give you a kiss on every part as I teach you its name."

Ivonne hesitated for a few minutes. Then she said with a sigh: "All right."

And I began to teach her.

"Eyes" (a kiss here), "that is ojos; cheek" (another kiss), "that is called mejilla; lips, labios; eyelashes, pestanas; mouth, boca; hands, manos," and so on.

To render the class pleasant, I recited in Spanish all the songs which poets in my country have sung with the spirit of their love to their sweethearts. Ivonne listened to me very attentively, wishing with her feminine curiosity to penetrate into the very soul of those melodious and ardent rhymes in which enamored singers expressed all the fire of their inspiration.

Ivonne made very rapid progress. With her knowledge of the Spanish language she could very well venture into the lands of Castile or South America, and ask with her musical voice the necessary things in the commerce of life. But there is a term, a simple term, which the poor girl could never remember.

For all this world contains, my charming and intelligent pupil could not retain in her mind the word for "mouth," and every day, at the end of the class, with the most charming grace, she would ask me the same question: "How do you call this?" With her pearly forefinger she would point to her sweet, coral mouth; and I, pretending to be indignant—we teachers must appear serious—for the thousandth time had to repeat the difficult Spanish lesson to my forgetful pupil.

The New Columbia Theatre

By Theodore Bonnet

If the friezes of the Parthenon gave testimony to the stately march of the Grecian mind then the new edifice that was dedicated to the drama in this city last Monday night may be regarded as not without pleasing significance. Architecture, as somebody has said, is the printing press of all ages that gives a history of the state of society from the date of the earliest monuments reared by the hand of man to the present day. We may regard the new Columbia Theatre then as a page in history that tells the story of San Francisco's aspirations in the direction of sweetness and light. It is certainly an expression of good taste, so fine a combination of the utilitarian and artistic, that one might call it a poem in reinforced concrete without being suspected of a passion for rhetorical conceits. There is poetry inside and outside. Even the thing that seems to mar the grace and simplicity of the facade is poetry. I allude of course to the horticultural display which alone excites the comment of those that believe it proper to judge a work of art by its defects. These critics who regard sculptured fruit as appropriate ornamentation for nothing but a rural Chamber of Commerce have forgotten their mythology. Wherever there is a temple of the drama there also is the shrine of Thalia who is something more than the muse of comedy and goddess of pleasure; she is the preserver of growing plants, the inventress of agriculture and arboriculture. So why not the fruit—even unto the pumpkin? But whatever may be the judgment of the fastidious as to the exterior of the Columbia the interior which, after all, is what concerns us most, is not to be cavilled at. It is without a flaw. Comfort and coziness, the chief desiderata, are here provided with much that contributes to an esthetic impulse. Here we find an exquisite delicacy of coloring subtly enriched by deft touches in blue and gold, and nothing of hackneyed magnificence in decoration. The whole presents that due medium in which beauty and taste eminently reside. The Columbia is a playhouse worthy of comedies and tragedies that have received the hall-mark of abiding merit. The opening of so beautiful a theatre almost in the midst of what remains of "the damndest finest ruins," was an event which might reasonably have been expected to stir the emotions and evoke unrestrained enthusiasm, but as a matter of fact it did nothing of the kind; not at any rate so far as could be judged from external evidence. We appear to have reached a point at which we have become either insensible to the romance of our rehabilitation or surfeited with the glory of triumphs that have won for us the admiration of the world. We are reputed to be an emotional people, but the emotions of the Columbia first-night audience were well in hand throughout the little ceremonial that preceded the professional performance. The people paid deference to the occasion by approaching and gracing it in their gladdest rags but not by their deportment did they evince sentimental elation. Their behaviour was that of unbridled decorum. So far as elegance of equipage is concerned the audience was one of the most notable that ever contributed sparkle and color to a local playhouse. It abounded in spruce gentlemen versed in the philosophy of clothes and elaborately garnished women as effulgent as the sunburst in the central blue overhead. It was an audience good to look upon, colorful enough to celebrate the opening of a Temple of Vestments, but upon its imagination the sentiment of the occasion never appeared to dwell. When Manager Melville Marx appeared before the footlights to point with pride and stimulate recollection he was accorded a polite greeting, but the salvoes of applause attested nothing more than urbane breeding. The eloquence of Mayor McCarthy, fired with the stimulus of the occasion provoked something of critical interest but nothing more. I longed for the fiddlers to play The Star Spangled Banner or Dixie or something that might get a rise out of that brilliant audience, but instead Charles Frohman presented William H. Crane in George Ade's comedy in four acts entitled "Father and the Boys." Even Ade was not himself on this occasion. He has given us a rattling good comedy, full of wholesome humor, sprinkled with amiable satire and interspersed with epigrammatic lines, but it lacks the Dickensian flavor of "The County Chairman" and "A College Widow." Ade is at his best when he devotes himself to the creation of types. He has given us masterpieces of characterization, but in this comedy he parades before us familiar theatrical personalities, men and women with wooden entrails. The comedy gives us no flash of the inside of things such as gives distinction to some of Ade's past performances. Let it not be supposed, however, that because he has not risen to the heights which hitherto he has climbed, "Father and the Boys" is not good stuff. It proved good enough on the first night to make that unsentimental audience rock with laughter. Ade's view of humanity is so insistently kindly and his knowledge goes so far beneath the superficial that invariably he strikes responsive chords in all to whom he appeals. This he does most effectively in this comedy. The company that presents the play does so satisfactorily but not with distinction. William H. Crane is the whole show. The cheery complexion of this comedian's general make-up would bring him acclaim in a comedy of much less merit. Of the members of his company none is so well known as Margaret Dale who is imperfectly cast as a breezy young woman from the wild and wooly west with talents that win her engagements as a parlor entertainer in New York society. Miss Dale is to the drawing-room indigenous, and to play an exotic therein is foreign to her temperament and beyond her mimetic power.

Who will begin an engagement this Sunday afternoon at the Orpheum.

The Scotch Vaudeville Genius

Harry Lauder is the greatest of them all. Vaudeville has given us some remarkably able singing comedians, but there is not one in memory who does not pale to insignificance before this Scotch genius. It would be difficult to say whether he is greater as a singer or as a character comedian, so difficult that there is no use attempting to pass judgment. The Lauder voice has been heard in phonographs for many years and it is all that the records made it out to be and a great deal more. It is a rich robust sweet voice trained either by nature or by art to perfect tones and it delivers its music with absolutely no show of effort. Hearing Lauder sing "I Love a Lassie" one might easily imagine that he was born to sing just that song and to sing no other, so spontaneously does it seem to flow from his smiling lips; but Lauder sings other and quite different songs and sings them equally well. His voice is just as sure in "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep" as it is in "Stop Yer Ticklin"; it is as finely adapted to the concert room, seemingly, as to the music hall. But to hear Lauder in concert would be much like hearing him in the phonograph; it would be to enjoy only half of Lauder. The other half is the comic part. From the top of his head to the tips of his toes Harry Lauder is a born comedian. Every feature is part of his comic appeal—the eyes of clear blue that narrow to thin lines under bushy brows or roll with knowingness or dance with fun, the nose that wrinkles, the mouth that pouts and distorts itself a thousand ways but is usually wide open in laughter—one might study Lauder's whole physique to learn the anatomy of comedy. There is no reason why this or that characterization should be picked out for special encomium because all of Lauder's parts are stamped with his genius for interpretation; but perhaps those who know Scottish character in its odder manifestations were particularly pleased with his depiction of a fisherman. Every movement bespoke the man of the sea, every contraction of a facial muscle helped the illusion and the make-up was a triumph of suggested dissipation. If W. W. Jacobs wrote of Scotch instead of English seafaring men, Harry Lauder would be found in his books; but Harry Lauder is unique in that characterization and perhaps only a painter could properly reproduce him. There was plenty of fun in the character of the simple school boy who is the "saftest o' the family" but there was something more than fun. Almost unconsciously but none the less surely Lauder conveys to his audience the pitiful condition of this lad, so that laughter may not be unsympathetic. You may laugh at the fisherman; he is an old rascal, to be sure; but you do not merely laugh at the soft boy—you feel for him. That is a triumph of comedy, of course, for the laughter that is akin to tears is the hardest of all to summon. It is always hard to understand from a distance why some particular actor or actress achieves wonderful success. It is so easy to think that exaggeration plays its part in the encomiums. That applied to Harry Lauder before he visited us, just as it applied to Alice Lloyd and as it still applies to Adeline Genee. But now that we have seen and heard Lauder, who is the man that will say he has been overestimated? —Edward F. O'Day.

Great Success of "St. Elmo"

So emphatic was the hit scored by the opening performance of "St. Elmo" last Monday evening in the Alcazar that the management immediately decided to retain the play a second week. It was witnessed by the largest assemblage of first-nighters in the history of the Sutter-street home of drama, and so favorably did it impress them than an exceptionally successful run was assured. Since then the audiences have gradually grown both in numerical strength and enthusiasm. "St. Elmo" is to many like the reading of an old and cherished letter. Pages of the novel from which it was adapted have been stained by the tears of our grandmothers, and in the Alcazar last week were more gray-haired people than are usually seen there. But the younger generation found the play hardly less interesting than did their elders, for its heart theme appeals to all and its style of construction is strongly modern. The big sympathetic audiences, after they had shed their sometimes silent tears, revived to applaud lustily at the end of each act. Both old and young did the hand-clapping. The ability of the Alcazar company was never put to more exacting test than by this play and to the cast is largely due the success of the performance. John Ince, as St. Elmo Murray, realizes in his own person all the romantic attributes of this well-known figure. Evelyn Vaughan makes Edna Earl a young woman well worth all the trouble made over her. Grace Travers as the other girl in the case, Adele Belgarde as St. Elmo's mother, Christie MacLean as the garrulous Mrs. Wood, Bessie Barriscale as her daughter, and Louis Bennison, Will R. Walling, George Baldwin, William Garwood, Charles Trowbridge, Howard Hickman, Charles Dow Clark and Walter Belasco have seldom been seen to better advantage than in "St. Elmo." "All on Account of Eliza" is to follow.

Sembrich's Last Concert

The last of the Sembrich concerts will be given at the Garrick Theatre this Sunday afternoon, January 16 at two-thirty p. m. The program on this occasion will be given entirely by Mme. Sembrich and will be a glorious feast of song. With Frank LaForge at the piano the "diva" will sing a program divided into three parts. Part one will consist of "Classical Airs" by Bach, Paradies, Handel; part two, "Classical German Songs" by Schubert, Schumann and Brahms; part three, "Modern Songs" by Massenet, Richard Strauss, Paderewski, Frank LaForge and others. The artist also promises to sing a few of her favorites in addition. Next Tuesday afternoon Mme. Sembrich, assisted by Rogers and LaForge, will sing in Oakland for the first time, repeating the wonderful program of last Thursday night in this city. The concert will be given at Ye Liberty Playhouse where the sale of seats is now open.

Another Crane Week at the Columbia

William H. Crane's engagement at the new Columbia will continue for a second and last week commencing with next Monday night, January 17. Matinees will be given Wednesday and Saturday. Marie Cahill who made a big hit here the season before last in "Marrying Mary" will be the second attraction at the Columbia, opening there on Monday, January 24 in her newest musical play success, "The Boys and Betty."

Frank LaForge in a Chopin Recital

Mr. Frank LaForge, the eminent young pianist who has again made a great hit with Sembrich as he did previously with Gadski, announces an "Afternoon with Chopin" at the Hotel St. Francis Ball Room on next Wednesday afternoon, January 19 at three o'clock. On this occasion the gifted artist will play the following works of the Polish 'tone poet': "Fantasie Impromptu," "Preludes" in A major, D flat major and C minor, "Ballade," A flat major, "Impromptu," F sharp major, "Nocturne" in C minor, three of the "Etudes," "Marche Funebre" and the "Scherzo" in C sharp minor. Tickets will be $1.00 and may be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co's and at the St. Francis Hotel news stand.

Olga Nethersole in Repertoire

At the Van Ness Olga Nethersole will enter into the second and last week of her local engagement Monday night. She will repeat "The Writing on the Wall" for one or two performances during the latter half of her stay. Miss Nethersole will also be seen in a selection of the best roles of her extensive repertoire, and will include performances of "Magda," "The Second Mrs. Tanquaray" and "Camille."Altogether the Nethersole repertoire for the coming week is an attractive theatrical bill of fare. In all her plays Miss Nethersole will be supported by the full strength of her company. Aphie Louis James, the tragedian, supported by the charming Aphie James, will be the Van Ness' following attraction. Mr. James is this season presenting two elaborate Shakespearean revivals, Edwin Booth's version of "King Henry VIII" and "The Merchant of Venice."

"Brewster's Millions" at the Savoy

The last performances of Eugene Walter's great melodrama, "The Wolf," will be given at the Savoy Theatre this Saturday afternoon and evening, and at the matinee Sunday Cohan and Harris will present, for one week only, "Brewster's Millions." The play is adapted from the most popular story ever written by George Barr McCutcheon. It is full of humor and the dramatic possibilities in it have been well developed in the stage adaptation made by Winchell Smith and Byron Ongley. The role of "Monty" Brewster is taken by Royal Tracy, upon whom the heaviest burden of the play rests. Among the players are Gus Christie, Carl W. Gerard, Fred Loomis, Louise Sanford, Franklin George, Richard Webster, Arthur Brahms, Den Wilkes, Katherine Ray, Marie Horton, Morgia Lytton, Gene Foxcroft and Henry Carl Lewis. Following "Brewster's Millions" comes Max Figman, the favorite comedian, in "Mary Jane's Pa."

Geisha Girls at the Orpheum

The Eight Geishas who will appear for the first time in this city at the Orpheum next week are Japanese girls imported from Nagasaki. Their act consists of singing and dancing to the accompaniment of the samisen, a Japanese kind of banjo. Their posture dancing is illustrative of Japanese poems and legends and is accomplished with great grace and expression. They also introduce dances of a humorous character. Geisha girls are trained in the art of entertaining from childhood. They participate in all formal entertainments of the social life of the land of the chrysanthemum. Jean Clermont's Circus is a novelty from Germany consisting of a pretentious display of dogs, ponies and roosters. Brown, Harris and Brown are comedians and singers. The Doherty Sisters, Anna and Lillian, will give zest and sparkle to the new bill with their songs and dances. Their witticism are all new and they dress very handsomely and tastefully. Next week will be the last of the Willy Pantzer Company, Una Clayton and Company, Mr. and Mrs. Voelker and of the great Bernardi.

"Morals of Marcus" at Ye Liberty

Commencing next Monday evening the management of Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will present their new leading lady, Miss Blanche Hall whose inaugural appearances in "My Wife" this week have shown her to be a fine actress, in "The Morals of Marcus." This is the comedy in which Marie Doro starred under the management of Charles Frohman last season. It is written in the happiest vein of that brilliant Englishman, William J. Locke, and is one of the brightest, daintiest and most pleasing comedies the stage has seen in many a day. The unusual success Miss Hall achieved in the role of Carlotta in Los Angeles prompted Ye Liberty management to stage it during the second week of her engagement across the bay, so we are assured in advance that she has a thorough understanding of the difficult character. Sydney Ayres will appear as Marcus Ordeyne, and the other favorites will be happily cast. "Brewster's Millions," for the first time on any stage at popular prices, is the announcement to follow.

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

Colors in Dress

Black-and-white is the combination that is making progress just now. It marks the winter development from the grey, which has had so great a vogue during the last few months. Along with it comes a great use of silver grey with strong black pattern particularly in neckwear. The smartest cravats are of heavy Spitalfields silk and have a general small pattern effect in grey, with broad diagonal lines of plain black. The shape most in vogue is a large loose-ended knot, but I begin to see once-overs tied very loosely from similar cravats. In fact, the knot of the day will make a once-over quite readily. Anything in the way of a small barrel or a tight cravat of any sort is out of date. You never, for instance, see an Ascot or a four-in-hand. Some knots are made so that the barrel is plain black, usually with a satin surface, and the aprons of grey, with a black pattern, nearly always of the stripe variety. Both effects are distinctly the fashionable wear in cravats. A pin is never worn unless the formation of the cravat actually requires it.

Elsewhere grey holds its own with great firmness. Grey suitings with a diagonal line-pattern in black and never with any color, are the latest thing. But the effects have so little variety that I do not think they will keep their vogue. Homespuns seem to be a little more in use for suitings, but vicuna is much spoken of for overcoatings, and all full-dress trousers come in worsteds—grey with a not very pronounced black stripe.

Grey morning coats—dark and of quiet pattern—have shown themselves in some smart West End quarters. I have seen these made of a soft vicuna and braided with black. The effect is more striking than could altogether be desired. But there is a class of men, particularly on the Stock Exchange, to whom this kind of thing makes a great appeal. The black morning coat is always braided, and the lapels roll pretty low. As the waistcoat worn with the morning coat now always matches the coat, and is cut fairly low in the neck—lower than a frock coat waistcoat—the bold neckwear has a good chance.

Brown has been boomed for a revival by some of the critics, but I think this is entirely the result of faulty observation. Someone saw the King shooting in a brown Norfolk suit and, not understanding the subject, made a song about it in the halfpenny press. But grey Norfolk suits, as far as I know, have not shown any signs of being the taste of the moneyed crowd who are the only people that shoot regularly. A loose homespun, generally in a dull brown, is the material that these people use, and contrary to the opinion of the nobodies who try to write about dress in our papers, the country-house man is not at all extravagant about the renewals of his shooting outfit. A man who turns up with the guns always in a new suit and with everything smart and spotless about his leggings and boots, is the outsider. The regular crowd treat shooting as an undress business. Their gun-cases, portmanteaux and everything else about them are well worn and mark their owners as members of the regular shooting set. I should think the King would about as soon go shooting in a dinner jacket as in the brilliant new grey shooting suits that newcomers are sometimes indiscreet enough to order.

Where brown does show itself a little bit is in the big rainproof Donegal overcoat which some men use in the country. This is not to be confounded with a motor coat. It is a walking or fishing coat. And while fabrics chemically treated to keep out the rain have been a good deal used for overcoats for town wear, the country rain-proof coat still owes its remarkable powers of exclusion to the peculiar hairy surface which is possessed by Donegal tweeds. They are loose in wear and you would not think they would keep out the lightest shower. But the water trickles off the surface. No one, of course, wears a rubber overcoat.

Color does show itself in one place, and that is in the handkerchief. There are a great many colored silk handkerchiefs in the West End, and, reversing the fashion of a few years ago, the pattern is all in the middle, the deep hemstitched border being plain. Dark green is a favorite ground color and the patterns are quite bold, generally in brown or claret red. I have also seen men with black-and-white handkerchiefs in the same designs as the cravat—an extension of the great tendency lately shown to carry one idea right through. When self-colored cravats were in use you will remember that I mentioned socks to match. Now we have black socks with a grey pattern, and here and there this expensive idea of a special combination of cravat and handkerchief. Another handkerchief which is seen is white with a thin waved red line pattern all over it. This is in cambric and the pattern goes right to the edge, with an effect not altogether unpleasing. You see we are hankering after some touch of color in our greyness, and as fashion will not have anything but grey in neckwear, suits and trousers, we have to get it in the handkerchief. The same feeling has led to a revival of the coat-flower idea. Many men wear a colored flower in the lapel button-hole of the overcoat. For evening dress, colored handkerchiefs are not used at all, but a very beautiful hemstitched handkerchief in white china crepe is carried by the ultra smart. One advantage of it is that it crushes to a small bulk and can be carried comfortably in the sleeve. —The Haberdasher, London.

and the Valle Nacional their version of conditions or their opinion of John Kenneth Turner's awful revelations on their behalf. As it is no part of Mr. Hearst's plan to publish the truth of this matter either in confirmation of Turner or in refutation of that semi-veracious chronicler, the necessity of a knowledge of the vernacular by Journalist Stevens is entirely negligible. Still I am convinced that if Oscar Wilde had been conversant with the latest up-to-date methods of American journalism he would never have written that protest of his against the Decay of Lying—or, in any event, he would not have taken such a pessimistic view of the future of the art.

Some day I shall make a few "revelations" of my own concerning the American occupation of Mexico as that phenomnon has disclosed itself to my intelligent observation during a five months' stay in this "land of opportunity." My brochure will be entitled, "The Romance and Reality of a Mexican Shoestring." As far as I have been able to learn most of the American "enterprise" in Mexico is the outcome of shrewd alacrity to foresee an advantage in things overlooked by preceding adventurers. If the scheming Gringo could make the receptive Mexican in authority see personal profit in the proposition, the fortune of both was assured in the ensuing "concession." A bookkeeper earning $100 a month from a firm of safe makers in New York once upon a time was sent to Mexico City to "straighten out" the accounts of the local agent. He had not been in the Mexican capital forty-eight hours before he became aware of the financial possibilities of supplying every government office in the republic with safes. Within a week he had arranged a monopoly concession on a partnership basis with a high government official. That was ten years ago. Today this "promoter" is rated in the local Bradstreet at five million pesos. Another immigrant, a Canadian, came here twenty years ago as a brakeman on a little railroad, and by dint of close attention to his duty was finally promoted to be an engineer of a switch engine in the yards of the company. He was a thrifty fellow and accumulated much money by loaning seventy-five of his hundred pesos every month at 20 per cent to his fellow workmen in the railroad employ. He is now "one of the leading bankers" of the nation. It is to his credit, however, that he cancelled 30,000 pesos of usurious debt owing by the railroad men, when he began to do business with the government. Mexico is full of these high financiers, all of whom arose from similarly humble beginnings. But the day of the "piker" is temporarily suspended. The panic stress that tied up so many great industries in the United States a year ago is just beginning to affect business in Mexico and there is now no field for the "shoestring" promoter. He has been here "looking over the ground," and it doesn't look good to him. He is going back to Kansas and Oklahoma so numerously that he has reserved all the pullman berths northward for at least three weeks in advance. Mexico has ceased to be the "land of opportunity" for the "small investor." But it is still a good place to "promote" anything that involves the expenditure of money symbolized in from five to seven figures. Mexico is always open to that sort of thing.

double rates for several trips around the suburbs—we had driven about Neuilly, Auteuil even, perhaps St. Ouen.

At exactly thirty-five minutes past midnight a happy thought struck me.

"Cabby," I ordered, "go to the Pantheon and drive round and round it until I tell you to stop."

If Rose ceased crying it was simply because she had no more tears—she had exhausted the supply. As for myself, I was resignedly awaiting death and only longing for the moment when Casimir should discover us and land us, after a mad race, under the wheels of an automobile. That at least would be a change. We had been going slowly for such a long time.

Mechanically I stuck my fingers through a small tear in the cloth of the seat and pulled out scraps of horsehair. I did not notice that Rose was collecting them into a ball, which done, she pushed the padding back into its place, and grumbled: "You are stupid, Maurice; don't you know the company makes them pay for all damages?"

At two o'clock in the morning Casimir stopped in the middle of the Square and called out: "Sir, the tobacco shops are just closing—will you let me go and get two ounces of the weed? It's just around the corner, rue Soufflot."

"Most certainly, cabby, and I hope you will allow me to offer you a drink."

I was amazed that this simple solution had not struck me before. Very proudly I explained my scheme to Rose. While her husband and I had a drink she should slip out and go home. But there, women are never satisfied. It seemed I was a selfish brute. Casimir would drive me to my own door, rue St. Marc, while she would have to walk home.

"Two brandies and sodas!"

To describe my amazement when Casimir and I closed the door of the bar behind us would be impossible. A totally unexpected sight met my eyes. Rose, Rose herself, in the flesh, was standing on the pavement stroking the horse's neck—and Cocotte was neighing with joy in a way to touch the hardest heart. Rose turned to her husband.

"Ah, now I catch you drinking again! Well, I've been calling on Hortense; I saw your cab and thought you might as well drive me home."

Until then I had believed that the eight hours just spent were the most agonizing a man could pass. But to find oneself a prisoner with one's sweetheart, at the mercy of a husband armed with a whip, was nothing to the torture I was now to endure.

Rose had climbed up on the box beside her husband. Every two yards Casimir stopped Cocotte, rolled the reins round the handle of his whip, and with his left arm embraced Rose's slender waist. Then he bent toward the fresh, dewy lips of his wife and kissed her—once—twice—ten times—a hundred endless kisses.

The streets of Paris had before seemed too short—now they seemed never-ending. Oh, dear! What a length was that Boulevard St. Michel! How far away was the rue St. Marc! Twenty times I closed my eyes and stopped my ears. I lowered the curtains, but their shadows, their kisses, continued to dance before me, grotesque silhouettes.

Arrived at the Halles, I violently struck the front pane with my clenched fist, in the hope of putting an end to this scene.

"Well, well!" cried Casimir. "What is the matter? Anything wrong? You've had a good time for eight hours driving around in my cab with some young woman, and just you leave me alone. I'm only being a bit sweet with my old woman, as I've every right to be. So don't you try to interrupt me again."

Auto Notes

Following a custom established two years ago, the New Rambler is exclusively shown during the New York shows at the Rambler Building, Broadway and Sixty-second street, New York. The Rambler Automobile Company of New York has arranged for the reception of Rambler dealers, Rambler owners and Rambler friends in a way which would be quite impossible at the Palace or Garden Shows. Such conveniences will be provided for the comfort of the dealer that he will be quite sure to appreciate an opportunity to escape the crowd of curious ones who might be spectators of his business transactions. Such special arrangements have been made for the comfort of visitors that the friends of the Rambler will make the Rambler Building their headquarters, receive mail there, dictate letters and make business appointments.

R. G. Cox of Watsonville is a strong believer in Diamond Tires. He writes that on his Mitchell car one Diamond Tire covered 12,980 miles before being taken off. The other three have run over 8,000 miles and are still in very good condition.

The inclosing of all moving parts of an automobile in metal housings is an idea of construction that is to be largely followed by all the leading manufacturers in 1911 and the construction of this housing by units, as first brought out, and now used by the Chalmers-Detroit Motor Company, seems to be the most popular. In the two unit idea the engine base or crank case, the clutch, flywheel and transmission are carried in a single housing, making a unit power plant, while the drive shaft, the differential and driving axle are enclosed in another single housing, making a unit power delivery. All moving parts are within these two housings and are running in a bath of oil rather than being exposed to the dirt and grit. These ideas are mechanical refinements, and are not only a great saving to an automobile but are a great saving of wear and tear on any apparatus. "Personally," says E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Company, "I consider this idea the most marked improvement brought out recently and I am not surprised to find that it is to be largely adopted."

Mr. Fred Swanton of Santa Cruz made a remarkable trip recently with his top 60 horsepower Thomas flyer, going from Santa Cruz to San Francisco in record time. Road conditions were good on the entire trip with the exception of San Mateo.

The exhibit of the Packard Motor Car Company in the commercial vehicle section of the Tenth National Automobile Show, Madison Square Garden, New York, January 8 to 15, consists of one of the several trucks recently built for John Wanamaker. This is a good example of the progress that has been made to meet business requirements in body designing as well as in the mechanical constructions of trucks. The Packard three-ton truck is manufactured as a standard chassis in two lengths, to each of which may be fitted either a long or a short platform. There is an extensive line of optional bodies and the Packard company is provided with designs for a great number of special bodies. In addition, any other type of special body will be designed and built to order. The normal capacity of the Packard truck is three tons and the maximum speed twelve miles an hour. The price of the standard chassis is $3,400, and the price of the complete truck with standard body and equipment is $3,550.

The Fisk Rubber Company of Chickopee Falls, Mass., have purchased five Chalmers-Detroit "30" runabouts for their salesmen in different parts of the country. The selection was made after a careful tryout of all the automobiles offered for that purpose.

Charles S. Howard, head of the Howard Automobile Company, Pacific Coast Distributors of Buicks and Oldsmobiles, has returned from Los Angeles with most encouraging reports of conditions in the South. "It is not a question of prophesying what we believe will come to pass when the busy season begins," said Howard, "but it is already a fact, and our Los Angeles branch has been kept hard at work to its fullest capacity through the entire winter season and our demonstrators are hardly given a moment's rest. The recent success of the Buick "40" in the 50-mile race at Ascot Park, Los Angeles, following closely upon the winning of that grilling race across the desert from Los Angeles to Phoenix, has materially added to the popularity of the Buick in those sections."

Figures just compiled for the State of Minnesota show that there are in use in that State six thousand, two hundred and eighty-two automobiles. It is interesting to note that a very large number of these cars have been purchased by residents of small towns. The compilation shows that in towns of under ten thousand population there are in use eleven hundred and sixty-nine automobiles, while in towns between ten and twenty-one thousand population there are only two hundred and fifty-two automobiles. Among the best known cars the New Rambler leads all those within one thousand dollars of its price in towns under one thousand population, as well as in towns under three thousand and five thousand population. In explanation of this superiority in numbers Thomas B. Jeffery & Company have announced that an agricultural implement house in Minneapolis sold, in two months prior to September 1, 1909, two hundred Ramblers in that territory.

Among the many prominent owners of automobiles who started the new year right by purchasing Diamond Grip casings for their cars are E. E. Buhn, the New California Jockey Club, Dr. H. N. Rowell, Park Garage and Dr. E. J. Boyes.

It is not surprising that the Packard company features enclosed cars, because its trade has been developed along the line of providing fine carriages for those who are replacing their previous horse equipages with motor vehicles. The manufacture of enclosed bodies is one of the most important features of the Packard carriage building departments. In addition to the fact that Packard enclosed bodies are built entirely in the Packard shops and are especially designed for Packard chassis, they possess the further advantage of being interchangeable with open bodies. Many purchasers have both open and enclosed bodies for the same Packard chassis.

C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast Manager of The Diamond Rubber Company left recently to attend the Garden Automobile Show at New York. At the close of this show he will spend a few days at Akron, where the factory is located, in an endeavor to get larger shipments of the new Diamond Grip Casings as well as the demountable rims.

Parker's "Northern Lights"

Sir Gilbert Parker announced some time ago that he would write no more stories of Canadian life. Possibly the issuance of his "Northern Lights" comes in the nature of an answer or a challenge to Arthur Stringer's arraignment of "Canada Fakirs," but whatever the cause which has prompted it, readers will find no reason to regret it. Though the author has given us excellent and admirable work concerning itself with other lands, there will be a general rejoicing that he has come home again, whether for a short visit or a long stay. There are seventeen titles of stories of varying length, some of which will prove familiar to assiduous magazine readers who should be glad to have them collected in more permanent form, for it goes without saying that "The Error of the Day," "The Stake and the Plumb-Line," and "When the Swallows Homeward Fly," once read, will not be likely to be forgotten. Some of the tales concern the earlier days of the fur trading period, but the majority are of later date, when that splendid body of men, the Northwestern Mounted Police, brought law into the hitherto untamed wastes, and the railroad carried settlers in their wake, driving the traders and smugglers further into the wilds or taming them into some semblance of citizenship. Gilbert Parker himself was born in Canada and his father, grandfather and great grandfather were all in the British army during the period when England still maintained garrisons there, so he is well qualified to write of a country which he knows so well both in fact and by tradition, and there is not one of the seventeen tales in "Northern Lights" which has not blood-stirring dramatic qualities, whether it be concerning the pathetic "breeds," the white settlers, the "habitants" or the mounted police. Whether they be the typical "bad man," the heedless adventurer, or the ordinary characters which seem to drift naturally into villages on the outskirts of civilization—whether they be the primitive men and women or the more sophisticated products of an older culture, they are all alive, swayed by genuine passions, and capable of exciting more than a languid interest in readers. There is tragedy and comedy and pathos, but nothing commonplace, and a healthful out-door atmosphere which would be a fortune to "nature writers," could they but learn the secret of incorporating it into their library-built tomes. We could have ill-spared "Northern Lights" from any author, and it is doubly welcome, coming from an old and tried friend. Published by Harper and Brothers.

A New Book by Zona Gale

As a general rule an author makes a mistake in following up a great success by serving the same characters and settings in a second course. Either the new venture falls lamentably short of its predecessor or fickle public taste has shifted just enough to deprive the next chronicle of its due meed of appreciation. Zona Gale has been rarely fortunate in her volume of "Friendship Village Love Stories," but Zona Gale is Zona Gale, and there is no other with just her magic touch. The Love Stories are as far from being the commonplace recitals of sentimental maunderings as her "Pelleas and Etarre" was from the ordinary chronicles of septuagenarian preacheries. Indeed, many of these recitals will scarcely be regarded as love stories at all, since they deal neither with broken hearts nor with eventual marriages, though, to be sure, the progress of Miggy and Peter towards the natural goal of normal young people, and the affair of Liva Vesey and Timothy Toplady are always to be discerned in the background, and bind the nineteen chapters, several of which have already appeared as separate short stories, into a symmetrical whole. "Adoption" tells us a sad little tale of a childless couple who had arranged to adopt a baby. The foster-mother had been quietly preparing for several years for the time when she would find a child such as would fulfill her requirements. Now the little stranger had been discovered and her longing for "a little thing running about" was to be gratified, but the baby, the six weeks-old inmate of some institution, died on the very day that it was to be claimed, and there was nothing left for the mother heart but to bring the little lifeless body to be laid in the Friendship cemetery. Peter Carey might be said to have a double story, for, besides its being "All Miggy with Peter," he was attached to an old father, weak and given to intoxication, on which occasions he shocked the proprieties by wandering about the village and singing some lugubrious ditty. Surely it was the love of decency and right living that prompted the good women of the "Ladies Foreign Missionary Circle" to expend the proceeds of their entertainment, designed as a contribution to the foreign mission funds, in such an unexpected manner. There had been in the village at one time a teacher, a man who had come from "Away," and five years before, had gone away again, leaving his effects unclaimed. Now it was learned that he had died and his abandoned possessions were to be sold for the cost of storage. Amongst them was a small box of letters upon which three commercial drummers had cast covetous eyes, for, the subscriptions being in a female hand, it occurred to their heedless minds that herein they would find a rare sport to their liking, but "Mis' Postmaster Sykes," counting on the co-operation of the Circle, and trusting to the approval of the minister, effectually routed the triumvirate. There is more in "Postmarks" than this brief skeleton. Daphne street is properly paved now, and those who have sufficient curiosity to discover how the Friendship Married Ladies' Cemetery Improvement Sodality outwitted the common council and managed to get the work done may learn all about it in "Evening Dress." If there is anything more deliciously funny than the "Java Entertainment," it will have to be looked for in the other "Friendship Village" volume. To give even a hint of what it was all about and how it ended would be as bad as to give a child a peep into its Christmas package. Calliope Marsh, Mis' Timothy Toplady, Mis' Postmaster Sykes, Mis' Mayor Uppers, Mis' Holcomb—that was Mame-Bliss, Mis' Fire-Chief Merriam and the Library Sisters are all here again. Peter Carey, Miggy, Little Child, Elfa and Nicholas Moore are new comers, and Mrs. Oliver Wheeler Johnson. She ought to be in a paragraph all by herself, one of these arch, bustling, self-satisfied and sufficient young matrons, capable in her own estimation, of managing the universe and quite ready and willing to demonstrate her ability on that portion of it nearest at hand. "Land-a-livin'-an' a-dyin"! said Mis' Holcomb—that was Mame-Bliss, "I declare if I know whether I'm on foot or on horseback. It's bad enough to hev to run a fair without you've got to be run yourself, too. Ain't it enough for Mis' Johnson to be made chairman without her wantin' to boss, besides? She might as well say to me, 'Mis' Holcomb, you do everything the opposite way from the way you've just done it' and hev it over with." Let Calliope Marsh paint the picture, as she always does, in few words but graphic. "Honest, I guess what's the matter with all of us ain't so much what she does as the particular way she does it. It's so with some folks. They just seem to sort to set you all over, when you come near 'em—same as cold does gravy. We'd all ought to wrostle with the feelin' I expect." "I expect we had," said Mis' Holcomb, "but you could wrostle all your days with vinegar and it'd pucker your mouth same way." One of the chief charms of the village was its "togetherness," the spirit of working in harmony, so it is easy to conceive of the effect of Mis' Johnson's "otherness." Though Miss Gale has warned us that Friendship Village is not to be found on any map, the dedication of this new volume is "To my friends in Portage, Wisconsin." Books are issued so rapidly in these days, sped through and forgotten, that it is dangerous to make predictions, but given its just deserts, Friendship should receive the same long lease of life that has been accorded to Cranford. The Macmillan Company are its sponsors.

Sydney Smith on "Nerves"

In these nervous modern days, when "depression," "prostration," "melancholia," and "rest-cure" are household words in so many families, this concise bit of advice concerning depression and low spirits will interest many. It is from the letters of Sydney Smith, clergyman, social philosopher, and wit:

'Feston, February 16, 1820.

'Dear Lady Georgiana: Nobody has suffered from low spirits more than I have done—so I feel for you.

"1st—Live as well as you dare.

"2nd—Go into the shower-bath with a small quantity of water at a temperature low enough to give you a slight sensation of cold, 75 or 80 degrees.

"3rd—Amusing books.

"4th—Short views of human life—not further than dinner or tea.

"5th—Be as busy as you can.

"6th—See as much as you can of those friends who respect and like you.

"7th—And of those acquaintances who amuse you.

"8th—Make no secret of low spirits to your friends, but talk to them freely—they are always worse for dignified concealment.

"9th—Attend to the effects tea and coffee produce upon you.

"10th—Compare your lot with that of other people.

"11th—Don't expect too much from human life—a sorry business at the best.

"12th—Avoid poetry, dramatic representations (except comedy), music, serious novels, melancholy, sentimental people, and everything likely to excite feeling or emotion not ending in active benevolence.

"13th—Do good, and endeavor to please every body of every degree.

"14th—Be as much as you can in the open air without fatigue.

"15th—Make the room where you commonly sit gay and pleasant.

"16th—Struggle by little and little against idleness.

"17th—Don't be too severe upon yourself, or underrate yourself, but do yourself justice.

"18th—Keep good blazing fires.

"19th—Be firm and constant in the exercise of rational religion.

"20th—Believe me, dear Lady Georgiana,

"Very truly yours, Sydney Smith."

"Listen," says the author, his face wreathed with smiles of delight. "Here is a letter from a gentleman who says: 'It may interest you to know that I began reading your latest story yesterday evening on the train going home. Before I realized where I was I had been carried fifty miles beyond my destination.'"

The candid friend raised his eyebrows thoughtfully.

"But," he suggests, "possibly it was the motion of the train that put the person to sleep."

The little son of a country editor was being introduced to his new baby sister.

"Did you get her on advertising, too, papa?" he asked.

He says he kissed you against your will. I guess he believes it too.

Voltaire's Retort

That famous politician, orator and man of fashion, the fourth Earl of Chesterfield, was on one occasion at a grand assembly in France where Voltaire was one of the guests. Suddenly the French writer accosted his lordship with the words:

"My lord, I know you are a judge; which are the more beautiful, the English or the French ladies?"

"Upon my word," replied Chesterfield, with his usual presence of mind, "I am no judge of paintings."

Some time afterwards, says a biographer, Voltaire, being in London, happened to be at a nobleman's party with Chesterfield. A lady in the company, prodigiously rouged, directed her whole discourse to Voltaire and engrossed his conversation. Chesterfield came up, tapped him on the arm, and said:

"Sir, take care that you are not captivated."

"My lord," promptly replied the French wit, "I scorn to be taken by an English craft under French colors."

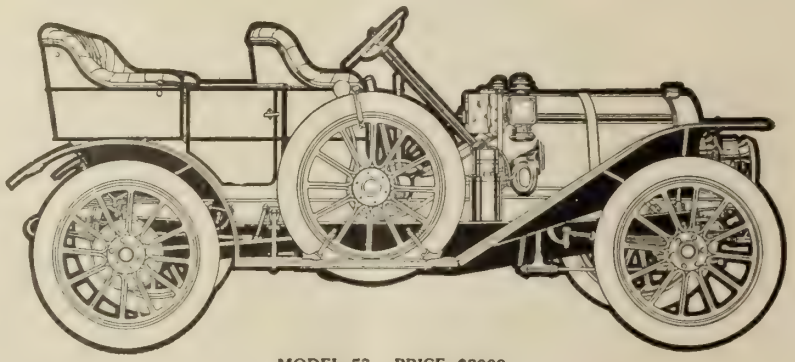
THE NEW Rambler

Greatest Value for the Money
Lowest Cost of Upkeep

The phenomenal results which owners of 1908 and 1909 Rambler cars have obtained has created a demand for our cars which is unprecedented in the automobile business.



MODEL 53. PRICE, $2000.

The elimination of corporation expense; adoption of a policy of permanent rather than temporary needs; personal supervision of methods, materials and work by Mr. Jeffery himself, and building all parts from the raw material, thereby cutting out the profits to parts makers, gives the buyers of THE NEW Rambler an automobile as good as can possibly be built at a price but little higher than that asked for cheap assembled cars.

How's Your Stomach?

Have you been ill-treating your best friend? Have you been insulting it by offering it a variety of indigestible and unhealthful foods? Possibly it has balked at this and you are now reaping your reward in indigestion. Better apologize by offering it a diet of delicious and wholesome H-O oatmeal, and see how quickly it will respond and perform its natural functions. H-O oatmeal is the only steam-cooked oatmeal on the market. Being dextrinized and easily assimilated, it strengthens and nourishes all parts of the body. It is made from the choicest oats, and by our steam-cooking process, all the rich, nutty flavor of the virgin oats is preserved.

The medical world generally recognizes the value of H-O oatmeal and prescribes it particularly for those of delicate constitutions and for older people requiring the maximum amount of nourishment with the least digestive exertion.

H-O oatmeal is free from hulls and grit.

Do not confuse H-O oatmeal with the ordinary raw oats sold under the name of "Rolled Oats" or "Crushed Oats." H-O oatmeal is never sold in bulk; it is free from dirt, germs, and all impurities.

H-O oatmeal is manufactured from the highest grade of selected stock. After removing all foreign matter, the meat of the oat is subjected to a very high temperature, and by our own patented process is cooked for several hours under heavy steam pressure. This steam-cooking dextrinizes the starch and renders the oats easily digestible. H-O oatmeal is ready for the breakfast table after from ten to fifteen minutes' boiling, and provides an inviting dish of sweet, clean, separate, tender kernels in place of the sticky, soggy, indigestible mass obtained in cooking the usual "Rolled Oats"

Possibly the "other" kind may be cheaper; but as soon as you have tested and appreciated the quality of H-O oatmeal, you will gladly pay the few cents difference.

The Maine Scandal

According to a special despatch from Washington to the Examiner "President Taft, it is authoritatively learned, is in favor of raising the wreck of the American battleship Maine which rests at the bottom of the harbor of Havana, and will lend his support to a bill introduced in Congress for the raising of the wreck." The despatch adds, "When it is raised all the world will know the cause of the explosion which destroyed the Maine." If President Taft is in favor of raising the Maine and gives his support to the bill referred to it will be interesting to watch developments. The Maine lying in the channel of Havana harbor is not only an obstruction to navigation but also a reproach to American patriotism. For several years there has been incessant agitation of this question of the advisability of raising the Maine, but seemingly in vain. The Societies of Spanish War Veterans have called upon Congress to order the raising of the vessel, and Congressman Sulzer has repeatedly urged that the requisite appropriation be made. They have received nothing but discouragement. Rumor has imputed to Mr. Roosevelt a strong and inextinguishable prejudice against the project, and according to gossip at the capital his attitude was inspired by personal considerations that grew out of his connection with the Navy Department at the opening of the war. Naval experts and many statesmen who were in touch with events in Washington just before war was declared are of the opinion that it was not an external explosion that caused the destruction of the Maine and that the truth might have been told in time to avert hostilities. A very small clique is believed to have been responsible for the suppression of important facts and for the persistent discouragement that has been offered those who would have the scandal ventilated. If Congress decides upon raising the Maine the probability is that we shall soon have another explosion, but one somewhat different from that which destroyed the battleship.

Perverse College Presidents

A few weeks ago we pointed with astonishment to the attitude of President Emeritus Eliot toward the direct primary. This distinguished scholar and eminent moralist had declared his distrust of and opposition to what is currently regarded as a genuine catholicon and priceless boon to the boss-ridden people of this unfortunate country. As the direct primary propagandists have repeatedly assured us that to be against it is to argue oneself a tool of some corrupt political machine it was natural for us to point to Dr. Eliot with astonishment. And for the same reason we now call attention with mixed emotions to President Schurman of Cornell and President A. Lawrence Lowell of Harvard. These scholarly persons who are generally believed to be men of integrity and to have more of the proverbial calm of the philosopher than is characteristic of the average college professor, have singularly enough expressed views about the direct primary that accord with those of Dr. Eliot. How are we to account for such views emanating from so high a source? It is hardly to be assumed that our two most distinguished college presidents are machine politicians. Are their views to be attributed to their ignorance? Perhaps; for certainly they are not to be considered so enlightened as some of the young professors in our Western universities—those paragons of knowledge, apostles of Zarathustra, whose mentality is of encyclopedic compass and whose range of specialties, though some of them are not yet dry behind the ears, is as wide as modern thought. It may confidently be predicated of Dr. Lowell, at least, that he is a narrow-minded scholar, for he has only one specialty, a circumstance eloquent of mediocrity in an age that boasts innumerable Jordans. Dr. Lowell's specialty is government, and it is probably for that reason that he considers himself competent to throw light on the direct primary. Dr. Lowell is much surprised that there should be a campaign for the adoption of the direct primary in New York "at the very time that in Boston it has been abolished as a failure." But perhaps Dr. Lowell is prejudiced against the direct primary owing to its being the pet expedient of reformers. He has no admiration for reformers. He says: "Reformers are always prone to believe that any new device of their sponsoring will work as they believe it surely will, and when it does not they are tremendously disappointed"; also, "They are far too prone to think that they have a panacea which will change humanity, whereas man is pretty likely to remain as he was before he tried their scheme—some good, some bad, and the mass indifferent to matters which do not touch their personal interests." Dr. Lowell talks like an editorial in a San Francisco weekly. He is anathema.

The Unpopularity of Denunciation

A few more elections like that which occurred in Boston the other day and we shall begin to lose faith in the efficacy of the gentle art of denunciation, defamation and villification. Of four candidates for the office of mayor the one that received the most abuse also received the homage and approbation of the people. Precisely the same thing occurred in New York when the people elected Judge Gaynor, a man of whom Sidney Brooks in his article on "The Failure of Democracy" in the Fortnightly for December, says: "He might be fairly described as that least pleasing of all the products of democracy, a sensational, notoriety-hunting, semi-political and wholly unjudicial judge." Last November the people of Philadelphia elected to the mayoralty the most abused of all the candidates, and the people of San Francisco did the same thing. Now how are we to account for what is regarded as evidence of perversity on the part of the people in these four great cities? Of course the same considerations did not act upon public sentiment in all the elections, but unquestionably denunciation was a prominent factor in each case. And it is not improbable that the effect of denunciation was the opposite of what was intended. Personal abuse is a weapon that fills persons of intelligence and fine feeling with disgust. They know that wholesale abuse, which is the kind indulged in by the average reformer, is never deserved by the person upon whom it is visited. Every man has some good in him, and it is easy of discernment if we but look for it. The man in whom defects are not balanced by good traits is as hard to find as one in whom virtue predominates to the exclusion of all else. Of this the rancorous reformer appears to be insensible. Not inclined to the sins commonly imputed to the practical politician he conceives himself to be wholly virtuous, and presumes to judge of the imperfections of others by his own standards thus taking on the complexion of a Pharisee. After some years of sympathetic observation we have come to the conclusion that it is the tendency to this complexion that renders negligible the most laudable efforts of our best reformers. By their scorn of others they imply so great a degree of self-satisfaction as to make themselves incredible. Ceasing to be human in their transcendent righteousness they alienate the sympathy of common clay; devoting themselves to the propagation of hate they arouse compassion for those they execrate; for after all love is still the ruling energy of the world and sentiment recoils from whatever would banish it from our lives. To accomplish his benign purpose the reformer must avoid the affectation of a suprahuman nature. Without a little of human sympathy he is incapacitated for practical action. He cannot advance the eternal cause of reform while he embitters us with his malignity and revolts us with his rage. When we see reformers strike the holier-than-thou attitude and proceed to magnify personal defects and disseminate every species of misrepresentation that can be contrived, our confidence in them is immediately shaken. Instinctively we become suspicious of their brand of morality, sceptical of their mission, intolerant of their manners and prejudiced against their cause. We cannot regard men as distinterested and unselfish who are above all things uncharitable. Good men are not always thinking evil of others or asserting the righteous efficacy of indignation in terms of wholesale villification. Goodness is not inclined to rage and wound. It is humble and charitable. It does not go about in quest of imperfections, infirmities and errors. It is not insistently thinking evil. It conquests its own repulsions that it may succor and raise. Our rampant reformers in their aggressive zeal for the public weal betray a hardness of heart that is incompatible with any of the Christian virtues. No man that is cruel and brutal to individuals has any great love for mankind or any disinterested concern for society. He may persuade himself that his motives are of the highest sacramental value, but he is none the less to be abhorred. It has been said that Judas justified himself in his traitorous kiss, his motive being to hasten his Master's declaration that he was the Messiah. But admitting that such was his motive we cannot regard his conduct as anything but detestable.

A Stanford Reformer

One of the hotbeds of rancorous reform in this country is the university at Palo Alto, an institution that is noted for the vast quantity, the superabundance, of intellectual pride and conceit fattening on the adolescent admiration of impressionable undergraduates. The faculty of this university is composed of young schoolmasters from the Middle West who owe allegiance and pay servile deference to that illustrious moralist and stern disciplinarian David Starr Jordan. Somewhat unsophisticated are these young pedagogues, which doubtless is why they are reformers of the cocksure type, quick and precipitant in reaching conclusions and susceptible to all the erratic tendencies of the age. The passion for reform raging in this university is an example of the irony, or, perhaps, to be more accurate, the sarcasm of fate. For this university was founded by Leland Stanford, a gentleman who is reputed to have done more to corrupt the politics of California than any other individual remotely or intimately identified with its history. How singular, then, that the young professors who condescend to live off the tainted money of Senator Stanford should be preoccupied with the reforming of politics in California and that by reason entirely of the prestige which they get from their connection with the institution of his creation they should be able to get an occasional hearing! Of these pedantic reformers we have been reminded by one Professor Frank Angell, who has been writing to the New York Evening Post in criticism of President Taft for having appointed ex-Governor Henry T. Gage to the Portuguese mission and Colonel George Stone to the position of naval officer. Gage he objects to because "his nomination to the governorship in 1898 was commonly regarded as due to railroad influence"—the same influence that, with the help of Stanford's money sent that gentleman to the United States Senate. The objection to Colonel Stone is that he was connected with a commission which was said to have been involved in a scandal that was "smothered" in the last session of the legislature." From Professor Angell's letter we infer that he has considerable talent for the retailing of gossip, and therefore we conclude that he is well qualified for a place on the staff of the star-eyed goddess. We hope that we do him no injustice by suggesting that he serves to illustrate what we have said in the foregoing discussion of reformers. Of one thing we are certain—that he does not scruple at disparaging a fellow citizen in a statement which it is utterly impossible for him to prove. He says: "The Gage administration was the most discredited and the most discreditable that California has had for at least twenty years." This of course is a choice bit of exaggeration. Henry T. Gage's administration was so creditable that his friends are surprised that he should accept the Portuguese mission in view of the fact that he might, were he to go before the people, be endorsed for the United States Senate. If Professor Angell believes that we have had no State administration worse than that of Henry T. Gage then he knows so little of the episodes of political life in Sacramento that he is utterly unqualified to discuss the subject at all. Admitting that Henry T. Gage was nominated by the railroad machine, he was elected by the people, and doubtless that circumstance commended him to the confidence of President Taft. The integrity of Henry T. Gage has never been questioned so far as we know, save by Professor Angell of Palo Alto, who has written himself down a purveyor of injurious political gossip. His accusation against Colonel Stone is as unwarranted as his comments on the Administration of Henry T. Gage. The investigation to which he alludes was proposed by a young man from Tehama, a county in which there is much prejudice

A Meaningful Conference

There was recently held in New York a religious conference which should greatly interest all the sincere Christians of the United States. It was a conference between a number of Catholic priests of the northwest and the secretaries of a large Protestant society wihch has had a big experience in western missionary endeavor. Its object was to discuss the possibility of discovering common ground on which all Christian ministers might come together to preserve for Christianity the millions who immigrate to this country from Europe. Statistics seem to show that the larger number of these immigrants are lost to Christianity when they arrive in this country while the experience of the religious workers indicates that they drift from their old belief into infidelity or at least into indifferentism. The problem is not a new one but there is an intensely new significance in the fact that Catholic priests and Protestant missionaries should meet in voluntary conference for the purpose of attempting to solve it. Here surely is a big step forward in the direction of that comity of feeling between the churches which has too long been regarded as a millennial dream. Reports of the conference make it plain that the utmost cordiality was manifest throughout and that there was a careful avoidance of any sacrifice by either side of its doctrinal position. That was as it should be. It would be folly to anticipate the time when all Americans will think alike in matters of dogmatic belief, but there is no reason why the various religious bodies the ministers of which are all equally solicitous for the salvation of souls should not meet to cope with certain fundamental problems of our rather crude civilization. One of these is the immigration problem, in so far as its religious aspect is concerned; another is the tremendous divorce evil which is working such detriment to family life. Singularly enough religious communions which have the least in common, like the Catholics and the Jews, have hitherto worked together with the most harmony in the study of these and other related questions. Now that two ecclesiastical organizations which find intimate common ground in their belief in the divinity of Christ have made the first move toward united action, optimism may well be indulged in the consideration of the outcome.

Marie Antoinette

Being a Review of Hillaire Belloc's Masterly and Fascinating Biography of the Ill-Fated Queen of France

By Theodore Bonnet

A man of letters so brilliant, so sincere as Hillaire Belloc and with his capacity for entertaining and instructing ought to be much better known than he is in this country. Mr. Belloc is a Liberal member of Parliament, and he takes as much interest in politics as in literature a circumstance that accounts for his grasp of the matters which he discusses in his work on Marie Antoinette, a work that combines the elements of a biography of the most pathetic figure in the greatest tragedy of modern times and of an essay on the decay of the French Monarchy and the inception of the French Revolution.

It is a pleasure to turn from such slovenly and perfunctory works as usually emanate in riotous abundance from American publishing houses to such a volume as this, exhibiting as it does zeal for accuracy, clarity and grace of style, and skill and insight in the presentation of facts. Few living historians can compare with Mr. Belloc in the art of narrative; in none that I know of is the dramatic instinct so highly developed. He is always compact, never dull; his sense of proportion saves him from the too common fault of magnifying his own discoveries and theories. History is said to be the essence of innumerable biographies. Here we have history compressed into one biography, and one that contains much that is the essence of romance and the essence of drama. It is history tinged with all the alluring hues of stirring historical romance, abounding in dramatic incidents that are arranged with a fine sense of climax and set forth with no adventitious aids to emotional effect. If readers of sensational or fashionable fiction were not averse to everything that purports to be instructive they might happen on this volume and threaten it with the ignominy of a best seller. The average best seller is mimic or fictitious biography without being literature. Here we have the real thing more exciting than the fictitious, and at the same time we have literature. Here the pen of a literary artist has sketched for us the life-story of a woman who lived, who knew the joy of living as few have known it; who suffered as few have suffered; in short, the true story of a woman the vicissitudes of whose brief, meteoric career are as strange, as rapid, as exciting, as fascinating and as tragic as ever were conceived in the imagination of man. In the handling of this inspiring material Mr. Belloc, with the unerring instinct of the true artist has eliminated the unessentials without omitting any of the details requisite to an understanding of his historical heroine. He has given us a most intimate study of this unfortunate woman—a study at once pathological and psychological—and incidentally he pictures for us graphically the rise and a little of the progress of the French Revolution.

It has been said of the French Revolution that it will ever remain inscrutably dark to those who fix their eyes upon it exclusively; that the only light which can clear up that dark must be sought in the times preceding it. Mr. Belloc recognizes the soundness of this principle, and in applying it reveals to us the elements that influenced the whole career of Marie Antoinette. Her whole fortunes, he points out, were shaped before her birth by Minister Kaunitz, who, "for a whole generation was Austria," and who determined for purposes of diplomacy on an alliance between the Hapsburgs and their secular enemy. In her childhood she was the pledge he needed, and he stood forever behind her life "like a writer behind the creature in his book." "It is he who designs her marriage, who uses her without mercy for the purposes of his policy at Versailles; he is the author of her magnificence and her intrigue; he is then also indirectly the author of her fall." It is in these words that our author states his thesis, and to prove it he gives us succinctly, lucidly and without ever becoming tedious the result of long and laborious research, not only of archives containing state papers and diplomatic correspondence, but of the secret thoughts of great actors in political and diplomatic transactions. He has lived among statesmen of a bygone age, and he has watched with them the changing aspects and turns of policy which preceded that great convulsion in the midst of which Marie Antoinette went to her doom. For her he has the profoundest sympathy. He knows her defects, her shortcomings, which after all are those that are common to her sex, and the worst of which he attributes to the method and manner of her rearing. He lays bare her innermost nature, and yet compels the deep compassion and warm admiration of the reader. He tells us that in her early childhood she was neglected. War occupied all her mother's energies. She was imperfectly educated. A perpetual instability became part of her mind. She received no training for the career she was destined to follow. Married when still a child she was plunged into the tainted atmosphere and luxury of a corrupt and debased court and environed by intrigue, envy, jealousy and hatred. After the accession of her husband to the throne her life was far from happy. There were many voids therein, not the least of which was due to the fact that her husband was far from congenial. He had inherited many of the defects of a nervous and debilitated father. The Queen, a woman possessed of a strong maternal instinct, yearned for children, but not for years could her passion be gratified. To this circumstance Mr. Belloc attributes many of those traits of character that rendered her an object of hatred to the French people by whom she was never understood and who were beyond her comprehension. He says:

> In such a situation Marie Antoinette's quick nature took refuge in every stimulant; wine she disliked—it was among her few but marked eccentricities that throughout her life she would taste nothing but water—but gaming, jewels, doubtful books, many and new voices about her, violent contrasts, caprice upon caprice, unexpected visits, sudden passions for this or that new friend, excessive laughter (and excessive pique), emotions seized wherever they could be found—watching in merry vigils for summer dawns, masked balls that took up all the winter nights, escapades: in a word a swirl of the fantastic and the men became for her a necessity that—had it taken some one form—would have been called a vice. Her dissipation was driven, as vice is driven, with a spur; it was compatible, as vice is compatible with her original virtues; it produced, as vice produces, a progressive interior ill-ease. She was a tortured woman in those years. Children became a craving to her.

Along through the years of popular dissatisfaction and discontent the author takes us, keeping us ever in touch with Marie Antoinette, pointing out the rapid development of prejudice against her, partly on account of malicious scandal but mainly on account of the exactions from home in the interest of Austria. All the while the economic entanglement of the French Crown persistently and gravely affected her life. For everything that provoked dissatisfaction she was held responsible, and when finally she became involved in the necklace scandal the storm broke. The story of this scandal is told with exceptional dramatic power. Though the innocence of the Queen has long since ceased to be a matter of doubt, though the calumnies against her have long since been disproved, and though with the whole story of the fraud practiced on Cardinal Rohan we are more or less familiar, in Belloc's book the details are given in a manner that

In the Wake of the Sky Pilots

Being a Recital of Some Incidents of Aviation Week at Los Angeles That Show the Flying Men at Close Range

By Paul Gyllstrom

In story, photo and song have the glories of aviation been described during the past ten days. The newspaper boys have vied with the "men birds" in touching the high spots, and the manner in which they have caroused in the realm of words has been nearly as picturesque as the gliding, skimming and dipping of the aeroplanes.

Once in a great while something epochal transpires and it is then up to the writers of news to do it right—with bright originality. Something out of the ordinary must be treated in an unusual way, and if the case demands it, new phrases must be coined so as to keep perfectly on a level with the topic. Aviation is no tame sport and seems to inspire special treatment.

Glenn H. Curtiss, with his little free exhibition the day before the meet opened, drove the newsgatherers to the dictionary. Since then there has been a constant soaring on the part of the lead writers, and it would be hard to say which paper here can boast the man with the longest sustained flight in aerial lingo.

Kings, princes, etc., of the air, sky pilots, aerial skippers are just some of the commonplace phrases in which the aviators were alluded to for some particularly daring deed. Synonyms for anything bordering on the ornithological or nautical were used, with frequent combinations. One newspaper man stepped a little outside this border and referred to "sky skating," and then told of Los Angeles having become "aeronutty."

But that was not the worst example. Another went so far as to describe the crowd pressed against the "far flung fence." He must have had to throw lots of ballast overboard in order to reach that. A police reporter told of a "midnight jag aviating homeward," which shows that it is spreading somewhat.

The boys simply ran riot in the coining of aerial verbiage, and it is probably due to hard-hearted copy readers that more of it did not see the light of day. Copy readers are compelled to remain anchored to terra firma.

But when one stops to consider how wonderful, sensational and successful the meet was from the very start there is little surprise that the newspapermen flew at their subject in pell mell fashion. They have followed the pioneer aviators, and to be a real bright aviator editor in the future it is only necessary to refer to the Los Angeles papers for primer instruction. A lot of good work for the future has been done. Very little in the coining of aeronautical phrases is needed. The Los Angeles newspaper boys have accomplished all that needs be done in that particular. All others will only be counterfeiters.

The first aviation meet in America has proved a great success, as has already been widely chronicled by the press associations. There were days and days of the glorious weather that Southern California is famous for. But Saturday was San Francisco day, and the mistake was made of holding a conference with San Diego folks in an effort to adjust Panama exposition matters. That day it stormed, and in fact did not clear up until the members of both factions were well on their way home. Since then there has been uninterrupted aviation weather.

Paulhan has been the hero of the meet, while Curtiss and his aviators Hamilton and Willard, have performed consistently throughout, and all interestingly. Paulhan did about everything aside from turning somersaults with his biplane. One day he did give a sort of aerial pink tea. That was the real social day of the meet. He took Dick Ferris, Mrs. Ferris, Mme. Paulhan and a couple of others up with him, separately, and traversed the course while the thousands applauded. With the extra passenger the big Farman machine ran as steadily as if skimming along a road set like bone. Had there been a little culinary department aboard the sociability of these little flights might easily have been added to. But it was permitted to rest with the waving of feminine hands to the crowd as the grand stand was passed.

And then the tumultuous applause when the biplane alighted and the extra passenger was subjected to embraces or congratulatory handshakes upon having completed a safe voyage. And Paulhan, the skipper, only asked if there was not some one else who had the right and wanted to go up. But it was, oh, so thrilling to the person who just got back to earth. That was a real jolly day when those stunts were pulled off. Then Glenn Curtiss did a little along the same line himself.

There was something of this sort going on every day from Huntington Park where the gas-inflated balloons were sent up. But ballooning is somewhat prosaic in these days of aeroplane development. Nat Goodwin was one of the most noteworthy to make a balloon trip, and it was so well directed by George B. Harrison, a newspaperman who has taken to aeronautics, that a landing was made at the aviation field. While the balloon was approaching Paulhan crossed the field in his Farman to greet the newcomers properly.

Then came the high flight of Paulhan which was unheralded as many of his sensational deeds have been. It was late in the afternoon when he started off, without so much as telling Mme. Paulhan what his intention was. After coming down from an altitude of 4,165 feet he was given a real good scolding by madame, and although this was accompanied by a kiss, it was insisted that he should never do such a thing again without her permission. Being a dutiful husband as well as a daring aviator, he promised. This flight must have brought several dollars' worth of free advertising to Los Angeles, as it is a world's record.

Paulhan was always doing something not on the bill. He must be considered a versatile aviator. Friday afternoon a few cows and horses nearly dropped dead when he made his noteworthy flight to San Pedro, a distance of seven miles. There is something sinister about this flight. It was just the day after the deal was closed for the purchase of land for fortification purposes at Point Fermin. He flew directly over the place where guns are to be planted for coast defense purposes. But Paulhan belongs to the friendly French, otherwise, of course, he could not have done it. But a few military men about the port were still scratching their ears in perplexed misgiving when Paulhan was well along on the return voyage.

Paulhan is also a little out of the ordinary in other respects, and must be considered of the eccentric sort. Saturday night some real nice French people of Los Angeles had arranged a dinner in his honor. Only the real smart French were invited. The guests arrived, commenced to laud the work of their countryman, tarried and then lauded some more. But Paulhan did not appear and a scouting party had to be sent out. It returned with the information that Paulhan and his wife were that very moment dining with some other friends in another hotel. This caused some very caustic remarks and Paulhan was referred to in words of sadness as a very misguided person. It appears that the persons he was dining with had not been invited to the big affair for reasons best known to the committee on arrangements. Mr. Cleary, Paulhan's manager, appeared and expressed his regrets at the aviator's actions. Then the banqueters proceded to laud Paulhan some more, and had as nice a time of it as could be expected without the guest of honor present.

It is quite remarkable how quickly the visitors to the meet have become familiar with various phases of aviation. Still there were thousands in attendance each day to whom it was all novelty. But the youngsters here have already grasped the idea and expressed themselves as learnedly on aeronautics as they did a few years ago on motoring when the automobile was still in its infancy. They have the plane, engine and rudder talk down fine.

One happy thing about the meet is the fact that it was carried out for ten days without a serious accident. It has demonstrated that for aviating purposes California has some of the best air in the world. Paulhan says it is more certain, firm and reliable than that of his own dear France. That augurs well for the future of aeronautics here.

The Question of the Hour

It is the One that Our Statesmen in Washington are Trying to Solve in the Hope of Making it Easier for Us to Keep Soul and Body Together

By Robert McTavish

Why does it cost so much to live? This is the paramount question of the hour. All other questions—economic, social, political and religious—have paled into insignificance for the time being. So pressing is the demand for the solution of this vital question touching the vitals of all of us that the omniscient ones at Washington commonly known as the members of Congress have taken it up for study and incentive to sage reflection. The prices of foodstuffs are going up, up, up, and the ultimate heights are inaccessible to the telescopic vision of the ultimate consumer. But Congress will know the reason why.

By resolution the Secretary of Agriculture has been called on to report how long meats, butter, eggs and other food products can be kept in warehouses without deteriorating. It is the theory of some members of Congress that the food trust is able to keep up the prices of the necessaries of life only by reason of its ability to store these necessaries for long periods and put them on the market only when the prices prove satisfactory. The supposition is that the warehouse is one of the enemies of the people since it affords facilities for a corner in foodstuffs. Hence the resolution calling for information. And hence also a bill applying only to the District of Columbia prohibiting the keeping of food staples in warehouses for a longer period than six months. In the Senate also there is yearning for enlightenment. Two resolutions have been introduced in the Senate directing an investigation of the increase in the prices of the necessaries of life.

It is a serious matter, this soaring of prices, so serious that our statesmen are alarmed at the state of the public mind as indicated by the rumblings of discontent and indignation that are carried on every breeze that blows toward the capital. Throughout the East and Middle West political economists are trying to find out why the cost of living has become aeroplanic in tendency and velocity. By some it is attributed to the tariff, by others to the new tax schemes of the present dispensation; the middleman is held responsible in some quarters where he is regarded as an extortioner, while no small number of experts in the mysteries of trade point to our old friend the honest farmer, who has begun to excite suspicion because of the many signs of affluence that are to be observed in agricultural regions. The farmer has been seized with the speed lust, and no longer rides in a rickety, creaking buggy behind a grass-fed horse. The automobile for him. He is so prosperous that he has ceased to be economical in his farming. He farms rather like a gentleman than a hayseed agriculturist, and the cost of production has so greately increased under his loose methods that impetus has been given to prices all along the line much to the distress of the ultimate consumer.

The imputations that have been made against the farmer have roused the indignation of the Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture. He is the farmers' friend. He is devoted to them and their gains, and he is now conducting an investigation with a view to exculpating the producers. That he has a preconceived notion of their innocence is to be inferred from the fact that to lessen the cost of living he would increase the number of farmers and decrease the number of middlemen. Secretary Wilson's views are concurred in by the Hon. Albert Douglass of Ohio who has made a discovery of interest to everybody that eats bacon. In an address to the House last week he said that the number of hogs killed for the market since 1900 has declined from year to year, and after dwelling upon the slight increase in cattle slaughtered in the same period, he said: "In this connection I desire to point out one circumstance which seems to me of special and somewhat sinister significance. From tables compiled especially for me from the reports of the bureau of animal industry I find that the number of calves received at all of the places in the country where cattle are slaughtered and where Government inspection is maintained has shown a steady and remarkable increase for all the years covered by this report—that is, from 1900 to 1906.

"In 1900 all of the calves received at all of these slaughtering points reached a total of 991,321, while in 1906 the number had increased to 2,257,012, or the enormous increase of 230 per cent. The reasons why this increase in the slaughter of calves strikes me as sinister are two. In the first place I submit that the food product of calves may fairly be classed among the luxuries of life. Sweetbreads, calf's liver, loin of veal and veal cutlet do not often appear upon the table of the poor; so it seems to me that this enormous increase in the slaughter of calves, in the face of no substantial increase in the slaughter of cattle and hogs, is a somewhat significant commentary upon the growing luxury of those who can afford luxuries. In the second place the increase in the slaughter of calves obviously serves to lessen the supply of beef."

Here we have a quite plausible explanation of the increase in the cost of steaks. As a result of Mr. Douglass' investigation it appears that it is the plutocratic passion for sweetbreads that has influenced the price of beef. Assuredly if so many calves had not been sacrificed to the pampered palate that craves the succulent sweetbread there would have been more cattle from which to derive our supply of beef. But if we are to regard the warehouse as the enemy of the people, it does not matter how much beef there is available for popular consumption.

The whole problem is a mighty perplexing one, and the ultimate consumer will welcome its solution.

The Rose of Virtue

By Baroness Von Oertzen

The curtains had been drawn—simple, oldfashioned curtains, behind which still lingered a remnant of pallid daylight. Ellen was nestling in a low chair by the open fire. Her pretty face was sober and colorless as the knitted scarf round her shoulders, and her expression was about as severe and uncompromising as her surroundings.

"What a pity!" thought Harry, unable to detach his gaze from the knitted monstrosity. "What a very great pity!" He detested smoothly parted hair. And Ellen had such lovely hair! How was it possible that she should be such a devotee to methodical primness, young and attractive as she was!

He had come in from skating in order to quarrel with Ellen. A day in which he had not plagued her just a little seemed half lost to him. Her restful calm, the order and symmetry around her, had to be shaken up a little, and for that very reason he loved to talk over all sorts of things with her. Of course they had been quarreling again, so far as it was possible to quarrel with Ellen, who never permitted herself to indulge in the luxury of hotblooded wrath. Her anger was rather pale —a somewhat lame affair. Even the water in the teakettle had gone to sleep, and Ellen began to poke the glowing coals in the chimney with considerable energy, as she resumed:

"No, my dear cousin, you cannot convince me. Your pity certainly is very noble and beautiful; but as a matter of fact, it really was a case of reckless folly."

"Hm!" Harry pensively contemplated the tips of his boots. "That sounds as if it came from a lofty pinnacle!"

"You scoff because I am right."

Harry leaned towards her and looked smilingly into her somewhat irritated face, in which emotion was twitching like wavelets in a placid, inland lake.

"Well, I may be scoffing, because it's mighty easy for those who have not been in the fire to prate of victory."

The shawl sank down from her shoulders as Ellen blushingly straightened her slender figure. "I have a very large circle of acquaintances," she said, meaningly.

"With your permission—" and the fragrance of a cigarette was wafted towards her from Harry's rocking chair. "A circle of acquaintances means nothing! Imagine some of the women who have been sheltered during their entire lifetime, placed quite alone and thrown upon their own responsibility in the midst of life—what do you think would happen?"

"That would depend entirely on the moral standard," replied Ellen firmly, drawing the shawl up again over her shoulders.

Through the aromatic blue fragrance surrounding Harry rang a voice in which Ellen could distinguish a smile. "Indeed? Are you so very sure of that? Can you not imagine certain moods? Yet you are young, Ellen—you are at the time of life when we feel summer throbbing in our veins, with a longing quiver in every nerve. You are accountable to yourself. No human being cares whether you make a glorious gift of your personality, or whether you keep it in grudging fear—you—"

Ellen deprecatingly raised her hand, a small, firm, white hand, as if created for defense.

"I was a married woman during three years, and thanks to Providence, I have never become acquainted with a mood of that kind."

"Accept my condolence for this confession," said Harry with a low bow.

"Now that I am a widow, it is even less seemly for me to dwell upon moods of that kind," concluded Ellen stiffly.

The stump of the cigarette flew into the fire. Ellen could see Harry's face now with greater distinctness. He was gazing at her attentively, almost compassionately.

"It really is a pity, Ellen. You are beautiful—of course, minus this knitted attribute of venerable maiden ladies. I would like to ruffle your halo a little."

"What are you thinking of?" Ellen jumped up and then sat down again, on the very edge of the chair, ready for the fray.

"I confess," continued Harry seriously, "that you have earned the rose of virtue. And I would like to paint you, sitting on a pedestal with the rose in your hand; an inscription underneath in gilt letters: 'Beyond Temptation.'"

"You seem to concede a wonderful power of temptation," said Ellen sarcastically, leaning back at ease. She had recovered her equanimity.

Harry smilingly drew up his chair. "I know drowsy summer noons near the sea shore, in the endless yellow sands, behind which life and the world itself seem to be blotted out. I know June nights, full of softly whispering moonshine—oh yes, when you listen carefully, Ellen, you can hear it floating and whispering. I know brilliant halls, full of wild exuberance and figures glowing with the dance—"

"Now you will have to stop!" said Ellen very decidedly. "I assure you all that does not tempt me in the least—it only repels me. Do you really imagine that I, with my principles, with my bringing up, would ever succumb to a so-called mood, with more or less moonshine?"

Harry gently stroked his sleeve, on which the warm light of the fire was quivering. "Yes, I am sure of it."

"Harry!"

"Thank goodness she is stamping her foot!" he said to himself. And aloud he added: "Let's change the subject. Since you are fireproof, you have secluded yourself altogether too long—even the pleasure of skating on virgin ice is not cool enough for you. Perhaps you are familiar with the fact that it is carnival time? Would you consent just once—"

"No!" Ellen drew in her lips. "I don't care for masquerading."

"As you please. However, Ellen, what a soul-uplifting sensation for you—"

"What do you mean?"

"The feeling of such superiority!"

"I allow every one to choose his own path," she said dryly. "But nothing and nobody can ever succeed in swerving me even half a step from my own."

She had risen, and Harry suddenly realized the Puritanical simplicity of her boudoir, the lack of all ornamental fancy. Just now he would have welcomed the most foolish comfort or caprice. Frost and chillness! He kissed his cousin's hand, and it did not seem to him as the hands of other women, soft, fragrant and intoxicating. He did not notice her eyes, which rested for a moment upon his inclined head. They were after all very much the eyes of a woman.

"Good-bye, Cousin Ellen, fairest of the cruel—and most cruel of the fair!"

She heard him hang the tinkling skates over his arm in the hall. It was a very merry tinkling. She hastily pulled back the curtain. A delicate mist hung in the branches of the trees that bordered the street. The winter sunset glowed in the west, cold and crimson, splendid in its icy cloak of scintillating crystals. Merry music floated across from the neighboring pond in de-

Impatient and Suspicious

In the neighborhood of Coalinga where the oil-wells are spouting golden streams land owners are waiting impatiently for news from Washington. If it does not come pretty soon something in the nature of a scandal may break over the heads of federal officials. Already there are rumors of the leaking out of inside information which is proving of immense value to men who are on the qui vive for opportunities to get hold of good oil land. Nearly two years ago a geologist was employed by the Government to examine land in the oil belt. He sent his report to Washington where it has been ever since. This report is to be published. Why it has taken so long to get it out of the hands of the printer many land owners in Kern County would like to know. They say that the geologist who made the report is a wizard in locating oil-bearing property, but his services are not to be had by individuals in Kern County. The investigation is to be obtained only from the official source. Hence the impatience of men who have land to sell, and hence also the suspicion that purchasers of land have received straight tips. This suspicion may be entirely groundless, but why does it take so long to publish the geologist's report?

The New Bosses of Los Angeles

The triumph of the so-called "silk stocking politicians" who elected Recall Mayor Alexander at the last election in Los Angeles has put some new bosses in the saddle. At their head is a trio of very able men who have been identified with the Lincoln-Roosevelt League since its organization—Meyer Lissner, Marshall Stimson and Lee Gates. Lissner is the brainiest of the three and is the sort of man who may go very far in the game of politics. He is a man of considerable wealth, having made a success of real estate dealing ever since he forsook Alameda for Los Angeles and now owns a good business block in the downtown district as well as other income-bearing properties. During the recent campaign Lissner adopted the card index system of doing politics which Postmaster Frank Hitchcock originated in the Taft fight. Lissner obtained much better results from this method than Hitchcock, who, it will be remembered, abandoned his scheme of tabulating republican voters by the million. On the night before election Lissner knew pretty well just how many votes the reform ticket might expect in every precinct of the city and was able to concentrate election day activities in the weakest districts. While Lissner lacks the qualities which make a political boss popular with his lieutenants, being rather frigid of temperament, he has a good grasp of general political tactics and is very ambitious. What he lacks in personality is supplied by Marshall Stimson who is a good mixer and of magnetic personality. So too is Lee Gates who, by the way, is already talked of by the reformers as a candidate for the United States Senate to succeed Frank Flint.

How They Raise Money

These new political leaders in the southland have adopted an unique method of raising political funds. Instead of gathering contributions here and there, as is done in most campaigns, they have taken a hint from the Associated Charities and have established a fund called the Good Government Fund. Men in sympathy with their political ideas make monthly subscriptions according to their means and allow the leaders to disburse the money in whatever way they see fit. The result of this method is that the Good Government leaders of Los Angeles have worked up a yearly fund of $27,000. No politician need be told what an immense amount of fence-mending can be done with that goodly amount flowing into the treasury every year. It has enabled Lissner and his co-workers to build up a formidable organization in the city as well as in the county of Los Angeles. Having beaten the regulars in the city election they are now engaged in preparing for the county struggle which will come with the State election and they are exceedingly optimistic in their prediction of the result.

May Indorse the Democratic Ticket

Already the plans of these southrons are being shaped for the State political struggle. It is announced by those who are in authority that if the State republican ticket, as a result of the primary election, is made up of candidates whose affiliations are known to be with the regular republican organization, the Good Government forces of Los Angeles working with the Lincoln-Roosevelt politicians throughout the State, will put a Good Government ticket in the field. On this ticket, it is said, will be many candidates elected at the democratic primary. In other words the leaguers will bolt their party and bend all their energies to place the democrats in control of the State government. It is a plan which cannot fail to commend itself strongly to the democrats, but whether it can be carried out without involving the leaguers in self-destruction is open to serious doubt. As Theodore Bell seems to have a clear field for the democratic nomination for governor, his followers are doing everything in their power to encourage the republican bolters in their course. Bell, I am told, would be acceptable to the republican reformers of Los Angeles.

They Have Premium Depots

Tourists traversing the Southern Pacific line from Los Angeles to Riverside have no doubt been puzzled to find a water tank station labeled "premium depot." While on my way to Frank Miller's beautiful Glenwood Inn at Riverside recently I happened to look out of the car window as the train stopped and noticed one of these signs above the door of the depot. It was a small bit of wood bearing its mystic legend in gilt letters on a black background. I was at a loss to guess why any station should be called a premium depot, so after turning the matter over in my mind, I asked the brakeman for light. He explained that the division superintendent went over the line once a month to examine all the depots and when his investigation was completed the station-master who had kept his station in the cleanest condition was allowed to nail one of these signs over his door for a notice to all the world how close to godliness he had approached. There is no pecuniary reward, no raise in pay; just a sign bearing the words "premium depot." Imagine a station-master in the north "falling for" that sort of thing!

Harvey's Railroad

The financial problem which has been thrown across the tracks of the Ocean Shore railroad seems to be well nigh insurmountable. But there is a prodigious amount of optimism behind this enterprise, which, if it can be converted into steam-shovels, may clear the tracks. Mr. J. Downey Harvey, the gentleman in whose brain was conceived the happy thought of a scenic railway between San Francisco and Santa Cruz, along the cliffs that are splashed with the tuneful waters of the Pacific Ocean, undertook the realization of his dream with more optimism than money. And yet he was far from broke. The fact is that he had about eight hundred thousand dollars, all of which he inherited from thrifty relatives. This money was as a drop to the contents of a brimful bucket compared with the intangible capital available for promotion work. Mr. Harvey, it is estimated, has separated himself from all but a quarter of a million of dollars in the course of his efforts to vindicate his judgment, but in optimism he is as rich as ever notwithstanding the present gloomy and discouraging prospect. On the right side of the ledger he has faith enough to move mountains and colonize every inch of the scenic railway from San Francisco to Santa Cruz, but the financial problem is an obstacle that will not budge.

His Priceless Asset

Downey Harvey is deserving of applause. He has proved himself a man of courage. Men of his type have achieved great triumphs and contributed to the welfare of mankind. It is only those that dare that accomplish big things. Downey Harvey has dared to risk his money in an enterprise the consummation of which would prove of incalculable value to the people of this city. That he now appears to be on the verge of failure may be regarded as evidence of imperfect judgment, but it must be admitted that he possesses an exuberant imagination, which, after all, is a priceless asset. The man without imagination never has any ideas, and he never creates an opportunity to test his judgment. He is a hopeless bromide.

That Valuable Franchise

They that sit in the seat of the scornful tell us that the Ocean Shore railroad was impracticable; that the territory through which it was projected does not afford sufficient traffic to pay interest on the estimated cost of construction. This may be true, but when Downey Harvey conceived the idea, (which untoward circumstances over which he had no control, have made it impossible for him to realize) he looked into the future. San Francisco was then making giant strides down the peninsula, and nobody had a tip on the earthquake. Harvey figured on land booms; and furthermore, before venturing to any extent he poured his siren notes into Mayor Schmitz's eager ear, and grabbed a franchise apparently worth millions. A franchise for a song was a pretty good starter. Indeed it was the finest bit of financiering ever done in San Francisco. It was enough to inspire unbounded confidence in Downey Harvey's genius, but in all this alert and sensitive community there was nobody to appreciate the merit of the achievement or to recognize the promise with which it was pregnant.

Our Generous Dailies

When Downey Harvey needed a little money to lay a few more rails he had to go out and beg for it. To sell bonds he had to pay our intensely moral daily press high prices to advertise the "good thing" that he had in stock. But to the credit of the dailies, be it said, while the money was coming in over the advertising counter they were very good to Downey. In those days it was evident that the budding magnate was struggling under a prodigious load of difficulties. The sophisticated read his "ads" abounding in golden promises, and smiled cynically. Never a hint from the dailies as to the situation. They pocketed Mr. Harvey's shekels and boosted his enterprise. Today the pikers that bought the bonds are disgruntled. Sordid individual they! How little they have risked compared with the fortune that Mr. Harvey put into his railroad enterprise! Instead of being sore they should applaud themselves for their civic pride and acclaim the press for its disinterested endorsement of Mr. Harvey's efforts to enrich the common herd by making bloated bondholders of the uninitiate. Instead of being downcast they should get near to Mr. Harvey and catch a little of his optimism, that other priceless asset, which, if it could be mortgaged, would produce sufficient money to enable Mr. Harvey to double-track his road from surf to surf.

Virgil Bogue and the Ocean Shore

Coincident with the retirement of Virgil Bogue from the post of chief engineer for the Western Pacific comes the rumor that this able railroadman will take charge of the Ocean Shore line and devote his energies to putting it on its feet. The rumor will prove particularly interesting to the commuters who depend upon the Ocean Shore for transportation to and from this city, for they have been exposed to many hardships ever since the road was built and would more than welcome a regular and efficient service. Although the appointment of Fred Stratton as receiver for the property gave general satisfaction, it is generally realized that the busy collector of the port will not be able to spare as much time for the affairs of the road as will be necessary to rehabilitate it. So if Bogue takes charge, there will be general rejoicing along the beach settlements.

The Patient Commonwealth Club

I am in receipt of a communication from the Commonwealth Club wherein it is set forth that that organization, after mature deliberation, has chosen for promotion "as the two policies most essential to the public welfare," the reform of criminal procedure and a reformatory for first offenders. It needs not the quotations from President Taft and Justice of the Supreme Court Brewer contained in the letter to convince me that there is room for reform in the administration of criminal law in this country, but I am not convinced that the gentlemen of the Commonwealth Club are collectively equipped for the working of this reform. In proof of this I have only to point to one sentence from the letter addressed to me by the Commonwealth Club: "The opposition roused by the club's former attempt to secure laws for a speedy trial of those charged with crime, shows that only the strongest concentration of public opinion will bring about such legislation." In thus stating the result of its efforts at wholesale reform in the last State legislature the Commonwealth Club is far from straightforward. At the beginning of that session the club's representative arrived in Sacramento with five or six dozen amendments to the criminal law. Amendments to the criminal law are not usually made by the dozen and the experienced legislators realized the futility of attempting such wholesale changes with the result that the Commonwealth Club bills were introduced in the senate by an enthusiastic but inexperienced senator from San Luis Obispo. Those bills were a joke in the legislature, and when the judiciary committee could spare the time, the new senator would make a motion to withdraw a dozen or so of them. In the end about the only law which was amended in consequence of the club's activities was that relating to appeals in criminal cases, which as it now stands, requires the attorney for the defendant, as soon as judgement is entered, to determine whether he should take an appeal. As a result notice of appeal is given in all cases; for as attorneys are not allowed time to examine the record to ascertain whether there is sufficient error to justify them in appealing, a conscientious devotion to the interests of clients prompts them to safeguard all rights. Now it does not follow when notice of appeal is given that appeal will be taken, but when notice is given the court reporter gets busy and the State therefore is put to much needless expense. The probability is that this law which has been severely criticised will be repealed at the next session of the legislature when the Commonwealth Club will be on hand with a fresh cargo of amendments.

Woman's Heney League, Take Notice

I climbed aboard a Market street car a few days ago and had the good fortune to obtain a seat. Ensconced near me was the Reverend Mr. Lathrop of the Episcopalian ministry, a gentleman who was one of the idols of the Woman's Heney League during the recent unpleasantness. Many a time and oft did Mr. Lathrop thrill the political ladies to intense rapture by the fervor of his reformatory eloquence. Verily was he the religious Demosthenes of that hot campaign, an exhorter without fear and of manner above reproach, in the eyes of the hypnotized ladies. As I have said, Mr. Lathrop was comfortably ensconced in a seat. The car stopped at a crowded safety station and a number of women entered, among them two nuns of the Episcopalian church. Like several others I surrendered my seat, but there were not enough seats given up to accommodate all the standing women and the gentle nuns even had to wait some little time before they could sit down. Did the Reverend Mr. Lathrop arise like less distinguished men in that crowded car, and give his seat to one of the gentler sex? I regret to say that he did not. Perhaps he was mediating a speech for the next meeting of the Woman's Heney League, provided, of course, that that organization is ever to have another meeting. Perhaps he was so immersed in revery that he did not see the many standing women. At any rate the circumstance is noted here for the edification of Mr. Lathrop's feminine admirers.

Our Incredible Demagogues

Somebody has said that the proposition to issue bonds for the purchase of the Spring Valley Water Works was defeated despite the cordial and vehement support it received from some of the most illustrious watchdogs of the public interests. Now my theory of the matter is that it was not despite but on account of this very support the proposition was defeated. The people of this city have been trained to regard almost everybody and everything with suspicion. For years they have never heard any issue discussed without somebody's motives being impugned. If the amenities of controversy are not absolutely unknown in this turbulent city they are at all events never observed. It is considered perfectly fair and by no means indecent to refute argument with abuse. Unfortunately the original champions of this style of controversy, who are our most vociferously virtuous citizens, have been treated of late with liberal doses of their own medicine and now they are distrusted as much as the most practical of practical politicians. When these men with something of the unexpectedness of a bolt from the blue suddenly discovered that the properties of the Spring Valley Company were worth all the way from eleven to thirteen millions more than they had previously estimated when estimating for demagogic purposes, and were therefore a bargain at $35,000,000, suspicion took hold of susceptible minds and soon became contagious. The company, I believe, offered its property at a fair price, but unquestionably the sudden switching of sentiment on the part of Marsdon Manson and Mr. Phelan's puppets in the Board of Supervisors filled the average citizen with apprehension. The silence of Mr. Phelan was in itself provocative of suspicion. What had come over this stalwart and consistent corporation-baiter? Who performed the remarkable feat of muzzling the uproarious tribune? It was unfortunate that the most mischievous of our demagogues should have given their support to the bond proposition. They have been lying about the water company so many years that the truth from them was incredible. But now that they are on record as to the value of the corporation's property they may find it somewhat difficult to hark back to their old cry.

Grammarians to the Rescue

Professor Anderson of Stanford University and Professor Gayley of California University, eminent scholars, and able at all times to find the right words to express ingenious ideas, are not at all satisfied with any of the innumerable textbooks of grammar, and they have generously resolved to collaborate in the production of a work that will render the philosophy of language accessible to the understanding of the dullest student in the land. This is an heroic undertaking. Nevertheless it may not be appreciated by the parents of the school children of California who are being incessantly gouged by the book trust, and who may be insensible of the importance of a simplified grammar. But let us hope they will be taught to appreciate the necessity of more light on the perplexing parts of speech. Let us hope also that the unselfishness of the local grammar sharps will soon be made manifest. It is not at all improbable that they have entered upon this undertaking free from sordid motives and entirely out of compassion for befogged intellectuals and profound love of the mangled and tortured mother tongue.

The Great Problem

How to make the study of grammar easy is a problem that has engaged the attention of many wise men, and by many the solution of it has been attempted. William Cobbett believed that he solved it when he explained the rules in a series of letters to his son. Since Cobbett's time no simpler system of imparting instruction in grammar has been devised, and yet his work has been simplified and improved by an editor who has supplemented Cobbett's lessons with copious notes. A notable work that has lived through the years is that of Dean Alford, who set himself up as a grammar sharp and a judge of the language used by others. He was a severe critic, but he met his match as a grammarian in S. Washington Moon, whose trenchant little work, "The Dean's English," excited much interest and no little laughter, for the author proved that though the Dean was versed in the science of language his utterances were sometimes unintelligible. Moon picked out one of Alford's paragraphs of only ten lines which was so ambiguously worded that without any alteration of its grammar it might be read in ten thousand two hundred and forty different ways, only one of which was the right way to express the author's meaning.

The Uselessness of Grammar

Mr. Richard Grant White, an authority in the use of words, whose works have received approval in England as well as in this country, condemns as altogether useless the grammar studies of our schools and recommends the study of authors instead of grammar. In his judgment to express ourselves satisfactorily it is only necessary to choose the right words and put them in the right places respecting no laws but those of reason, conforming to no order but that which we call logical. He has said that no man that ever thinks of his grammar while writing will ever write a sentence worth reading. While there is much truth in what White says he makes the mistake of assuming that the laws of reason and logical order are matters of instinct. Many grammar enthusiasts on the other hand make the mistake of assuming that the rules of grammar are always to be applied with exactness and precision notwithstanding the confusion that has been brought about by the loss of inflexions, by the elliptic style of expression and by idiomatic usage. The fact is that the rules of grammar are far from fixed. Take for example the rule with reference to the nominative and accusative of the personal pronoun. Who will admit that the phrase "It is me," is grammatical. Dean Alford insists that it is, and so does Dr. Latham in his "History of the English Language." He says that the word "me" is a secondary nominative, and he points out that nobody says that "c'est moi" is bad French and "c'est je" is good. There are more things in the English language than have been dreamt of. in the philosophy of schoolmasters. There are what they would call grammatical outrages but they receive authoritative approval. Here is an example:

"The boy stood on the burning deck,
Whence all but he had fled."

"But" is here obviously a preposition governing the objective, but the strictest purist though he might groan under the compulsion of sacrificing grammar to sound would not write,

"Whence all but him had fled."

So we see that the dread of cacophony affects grammar. The average schoolmaster forgets that there were several periods of English grammar, and that good usage in each is authority for much that is not strictly grammatical today. In Elizabethan English almost any part of speech can be used as any other part of speech. An adverb can be used as a verb as in the sentence, "They askance their eyes"; as a noun, "The backward and abysm of time"; or as an adjective, "A seldom pleasure." Shakespeare, who is regarded as a pretty good authority uses such verbs as "to glad," "to mad," and such phrases as "But me no buts," "the fairest she," etc. But of course Shakespeare was a genius, and as such had the right to make his own rules. We are not all Shakespeares, but so long as we have something to say, if it happens to be something worth while, let us not be excessively deferential to the parts of speech and the rules of syntax. If none but geniuses had the right to violate the rules of the game half of our book publishers would have to go out of business.

Lauder at the Press Club

The Bohemian and Family clubs had under advisement the propriety of inviting Harry Lauder to disport himself within their sacred confines. In both instances the board of managers, after solemn argumentation, decided that the Scotch music hall entertainer was not the sort of person to be admitted to the intimacy of the choice Bohemian and Family spirits. By what process of reasoning they arrived at this conclusion I am totally unable to fathom, but at any rate one of the greatest geniuses of the contemporary theatre missed the opportunity of admiring at close range the village cutups who find in these clubs their favorite pastorage. No doubt Lauder is dreadfully put out about this. Having been frequently the guest of the Savage in London and the Lambs in New York he must have yearned for the superior brand of hospitality dispensed by the Bohemian and the Family and for the more side-splitting quality of humor turned loose at their jinks. But while these two clubs were engaged in their favorite pastime of taking themselves seriously there was one club which found pleasure in entertaining Lauder. I refer to the Press Club. The newspapermen in that organization are quick to appreciate merit of any kind and they deemed it only fitting that they should testify to their admiration for the splendid genius of the little Scotchman. So they invited Lauder with William Morris, Walter Hoff Seeley and Julian Eltinge to an informal smoker last Friday night. Owing to a previous engagement for a supper party with some friends of his wife Lauder did not arrive at the club until midnight but he stayed until half past two and into those two and one-half hours was crowded an amount of conviviality and good-fellowship unusual even for the Press Club.

The Lauder Personality

In private life Harry Lauder looks a very different person from the Lauder of the stage. When he entered the Press Club in quiet tweeds and a soft blue shirt with a golf cap drawn over his bald head and a big pipe stuck in the corner of his mouth many who had seen him in Dreamland Rink did not recognize him. In repose his face is insignificant, owing largely perhaps to the typical Scotch sharpness of the features, the nose in particular. Even when he smiled he did not seem the Lauder of the footlights for his smile, winning though it was, lacked that exuberant expression of fun which helps so much in his dramatic appeal. It was only when Lauder stood up in the crowded dining room to respond to the neatly turned speech in which President Woodhead welcomed him that he became the Lauder of the theatre. Then the rich Scotch brogue was turned loose and all the dramatic intensity of his nature was centered in the telling of several inimitable stories which were absolutely new to everybody. In telling a story Lauder creates an atmosphere for his characters which is as perfect as the background for a picture contrived by a master painter and so skillfully is the climax approached that when the tale is ended laughter is simply inevitable. To the credit of the newspapermen be it said that nobody was willing to do any story telling when Lauder had finished but when Grant Carpenter and Al Dobson were called upon for some of their classics they acquitted themselves in a fashion which won the sincerest praise of the Scotch genius. It will surprise many to learn that Lauder writes most of his songs, words and melodies, as well as his monologues. He is a natural wit and humorist as a number of spontaneous sallies evoked at the Press Club showed. It has been stated that Lauder receives $5,000 a week during his American engagement but this is incorrect. His salary is $3,500 a week but Morris has to pay the London manager to whom Lauder is contracted $1,000 a week for the privilege of starring him in this country and other expenses of the tour make up the $5,000 a week which represents the total cost of featuring him.

THE STORY OF MATKA

BY DAVID STARR JORDAN

Illustrated by Photographs from Life and Numerous Pen Sketches

The author has written a touching story of a mother sea-lion. As literature it is a model of simple and direct narrative; as a story of the beautiful side of animal life it ranks with Black Beauty; while as a source of information on the life and habits of this wonderful animal it must inevitably stand alone.

Stephenson Wouldn't "Come Through"

In a Milwaukee court the other day some interesting disclosures were made to the consternation of the admirers of Senator La Follette, known to the cynics as "Battle Bob" and to the devotees of the Star Eyed Goddess as the incarnation of disinterested patriotism. The disclosures were made during the trial of a suit on account of matters growing out of the campaign of 1908. Senator Isaac Stephenson was called as a witness, and from him was elicited the real reason why he lost the friendship of the sacrosanct La Follette. Senator Stephenson gave his testimony with reluctance. It was to the effect that when La Follette decided to become a candidate for President his friends called upon the witness for $250,000 with which to sweeten the campaign pot. The Senator balked, and the demand was lowered to $25,000, but finally two checks for $1,000 each were accepted. Tackled again in Washington he agreed to pay the expenses of headquarters opened by the La Follette men in Chicago. They immediately engaged thirty rooms in the Stafford Hotel. The hotel manager demanded a bond for $2,800 and it was forwarded to Washington for Senator Stephenson's signature. He refused to sign it, but later sent the committee a check for $1,000. This completed his contributions to the campaign. It was suggested to Senator Stephenson that the cause of the break was his refusal to sign the bond. He said that the real cause of the break was his refusal to contribute a quarter of a million to the La Follette fund. Asked if his memory might not be bad he said that he had a stack of letters from La Follette and his followers which would in time be published and which would show up some people in a different light from that in which they had posed. It was intimated by those in attendance, but not brought out in the examination, that the chief argument used in the attempt to raise the campaign fund was a hint that Stephenson might be permitted to become the Mark Hanna of the La Follette administration. Incidentally it was observed that Mr. Stephenson had been measuring men as well as logs too many years to be taken in by this argument. La Follette has many admirers in San Francisco. They tried to induce him to come to this city to boost Mr. Heney in the last campaign, but he had more profitable engagements on the Chantauqua Circle.

Gossip About Mott-Smith

A Honolulu correspondent informs me that there has been considerable discussion recently about the possibility of Ernest A. Mott-Smith being boomed for delegate to Congress. At the present time Mott-Smith is secretary of the territory and president of the board of health, positions which satisfy his ambition, but his popularity is such that his friends in Honolulu are grooming him for the larger dignity in full confidence that he would be just the man for the place. One drawback is that he does not speak Hawaiian very well but it is thought that his reputation throughout the islands is enough to overcome this disadvantage. Mott-Smith has gained considerable distinction by his handling of the delicate leprosy problem and it seems to be conceded that if Prince Cupid is eliminated from the race, he would prove a strong candidate, both with the republicans and democrats. Ernest Mott-Smith is very well known in this city. When Kalakaua was king of Hawaii his father represented the island government here and made his home in the famous old Charles Low house in Lombard street which was afterwards bought by Judge Selden S. Wright. There were several children, one of whom is Mrs. May Mott-Smith Bird Cunningham, distinguished not only as a designer of jewelry but also for her matrimonial adventures.

Local Newspapermen in Los Angeles

The newspapermen of this city who have drifted to Los Angeles and are now occupying good positions there make quite an interesting list. The latest addition to the number is Edmond Stover who has been placed in charge of the Associated Press office in the southern city. James R. Nourse, formerly city editor of the Examiner and Bulletin, now occupies the same position on the Los Angeles Examiner. His assistant is Joseph Timmons who used to be on the Call and Bulletin here. Paul Gyllstrom, formerly of the Call, is now on the Herald George Parmenter, the artist, is in charge of the photographic department of the Examiner. His charming and talented wife who was Madge Moore of the Call's Sunday supplement department, has retired from newspaper work. "Billy" Matheas, formerly of the local Examiner, is now holding a fine position in the business department of the Hearst paper in the south. Young Stagg, the former photographer of the Bulletin, is doing camera work for the Times. Fred Vincent who used to be the San Rafael correspondent of the Call, is on the Record, the Scripps paper of Los Angeles. Our old friend Jimmy Swinnerton of bear fame is living at Monrovia where the extreme cut of his clothes which are made on Broadway, keeps the suburbanites continually gasping.

"Jack" Wilson Goes to St. Louis

John P. Wilson, one of the most popular members of the Press Club, has been lured away from this city by the management of a new opera house in St. Louis and has arranged to produce several of his musical comedies there. A number of very wealthy capitalists have recently completed the erection of a magnificent theatre in St. Louis and they plan to make it a musical center like New York and Chicago; that is to say, they will produce only original compositions and will send companies out to tour the country with their successes. There is plenty of money behind the venture and the auguries are all of the most favorable kind. "Jack" Wilson will probably open the new opera house with one of his musical comedies for which Louis Gottschalk wrote the music. At all events he will present several pieces there in the near future. Wilson has had great success with several of his musical plays, notably "The Filibuster" and some of his lyrics like "A Son of the Desert" have been paying royalties for many years. The pieces which the St. Louis managers are arranging to produce are highly meritorious in dialogue and lyrics and should score big hits. Wilson has a host of friends in newspaper and musical circles in this city and much as they rejoice in his good fortune, they are loth to see him go. A banquet was given in his honor at the Press Club recently and a number of other entertainments of a jolly kind signalized his departure for the conquest of musical St. Louis.

Olga Nethersole's Plans

Through the medium of one of the interviewers of the daily press we are permitted to learn that Miss Olga Nethersole plans the conquest of the European theatres. Her aspirations, it seems, are directed particularly toward Paris and next year will see the beginning of their fulfillment. Most of her plays will be given in English but "Camille" and "Sapho" will be played in their French versions. "Of course I will challenge comparison," vouchsafes Miss Nethersole, "for those two plays have been seen so often with Bernhardt, Duse and Rejane." It is by no means a certainty that Miss Nethersole will challenge comparison with Bernhardt, Duse and Rejane, for your French critic is a man of sang froid when he tackles a dramatic attempt and it may never occur to him that Miss Nethersole deserves to be compared with those great actresses. It is very nice to learn that Miss Nethersole went to Paris "for the consecration of her art." Also it is interesting to hear that King Edward told her that she "played like a Frenchwoman." Miss Nethersole was not sure whether or not to receive this as a compliment, for she had to ask the king if he intended it as one.

In Socrates' Cave

Gone and not to be recalled, it would seem, is the Nethersole of the burning soul kiss. As befits an artiste who yearns to extend her sphere of mimetic influence to the bounds of the world, Miss Nethersole has put on the mantle of serious thinking and devotes her offstage thoughts to profound sociological problems. A few days ago she lent her invaluable assistance to Judge Murasky in the disposition of juvenile court cases, among them one involving the parentage of a Chinese boy claimed by two women. Miss Nethersole, with less than the wisdom of Solomon, decided in favor of one woman because the other "bulldozed too much" but Judge Murasky wisely suspended judgment. Perhaps he thought that a mother in danger of losing her offspring might be inclined to bulldoze. Nature in such cases is apt to disregard the proprieties. On the subject of the relation of the sexes, too, Miss Nethersole has views to propound. We are in a benighted state, she says, mere dwellers in Socrates' cave, taking no pains to find out whether or not we are fit to marry. "Twelve years ago," Miss Nethersole reminds the interviewer, "I said we should have a physician's certificate alongside the clergyman's. Then I dreamed that we would dispense with the clergyman and retain only the doctor. In my farthest vision I saw no ceremony at all, but found us strong enough to carry for ourselves the lamps to illuminate our own footsteps." Which is picturesque if utterly inane. Neither the clergyman nor the doctor carries a lamp to illuminate the footsteps of men and women drawn together by sex instincts. In the scheme of this plodding old world the clergyman sanctifies the marital relation, raising it above a fleshly union; and the physician comes afterwards. Take away the clergyman or the justice of the peace and Miss Nethersole's lamp will illuminate promiscuous intercourse at which the doctor will throw up his hands in scientific horror. As a sociologist Miss Nethersole is less interesting than as a purveyor of soul kisses.

Sending a message is only half of the transaction. The other, and equally important, half consists in getting back the answer.

Sometimes this is a reply to a question, or the acceptance or rejection of a proposal. Sometimes it is simply an acknowledgment that the message has been received.

The value of the message depends upon getting an answer.

When a general manager sends word to a representative in a distant city, he wants to know that his man is there, that he receives the message, and that he will act.

If the answer is not final, but raises another question, there is no delay. The other question can be settled at once. It is possible, in one telephone interview, to come to a decision which could not have been reached without the instantaneous answer.

Each answer is made instantaneous by the Bell telephone service.

The Bell system, with its ten million miles of wire, provides the instantaneous answer for anybody, anywhere, at any time.

great Irishman's writings. Despite the fact that this new edition is edited by Robert Ross, the lifelong friend and literary executor of Wilde, and that the books come from the very reputable house of Methuen, the London publishers, the edition is fatally defective. It does not contain Wilde's single novelistic attempt, "The Picture of Dorian Gray." When Ross and the Methuens issued proposals for an authoritative edition of Wilde, Mr. Methuen, the head of the publishing house, was summoned to Oxford by the authorities of the university. Members of the faculty told him that if he included in the edition "The Picture of Dorian Gray" he would incur the displeasure of the university. In England that is a formidable threat to a book publisher and so Methuen who, like Wilde, was an Oxford man, yielded and the edition was prepared without that remarkable tour de force.

An Attack on Widows

From Mrs. Newell Dwight Hillis comes the amazing declaration that "widows are terribly in evidence in our cities." It is a statement which, coming from any other source, would fill me with antagonism, but uttered by the cultured wife of the pastor of the famous old Plymouth Church of Brooklyn, it cannot but excite a feeling of sorrow. Used by a man that bold phrase "terribly in evidence" would be the acme of discourtesy, the sign lingual of ignorant inappreciation. Falling from the lips of a woman, might it not naturally be ascribed to that irremovable and inexplicable prejudice against widows which is always entertained by wives? But it is not for me to dissect the motives lurking behind the remarkable statement made by Mrs. Hillis; it is even possible that the lady, in the hurry of a public address, overstepped the boundary of her intended discourse. I know not and do not care. It is only for me to do my little service to the cause of widowhood by maintaining here that the widow is the most fascinating work of the Creator.

A Defense Interposed

Very appropriately one might apply to widows the words which George Moore in an excess of youthful enthusiasm wrote of the woman of thirty (widows of course rarely pass that magic milestone on the way to gray hairs and failing charm). Does not the widow, whether she be plain widow, grass widow or blue grass widow (with no alimony), "present from the outset all that is necessary to ensnare the heart of a young man? I see her sitting in her beautiful drawing-room, all designed by, and all belonging to her. Her chair is placed beneath an evergreen plant, and the long leaves lean out as if to touch her neck. The great white and red roses of the Aubusson carpet are spread enigmatically about her feline feet; a grand piano leans its melodious mouth to her; and there she sits when her visitors have left her, playing Beethoven's sonatas in the dreamy firelight. The spring-tide shows but a bloom of unvarying freshness; August has languished and loved in the strength of the sun. She is stately, she is tall. What sins, what disappointments, what aspirations lie in those grey eyes, mysteriously still, and mysteriously revealed." Is it not the widow to the life? But certainly not "terribly in evidence."

She Is An Object Of Fear

It may be that Mrs. Hillis has gone to books for her widows, has caught the cynical reflection of the attitude of embittered married authors toward this paragon of creation. "Take example by your father, my boy, and be wery careful o' widders." Has Mrs. Hillis joined cause with Tony Weller? Has she, in fact, joined cause with the writers of all sorts from the earliest dawn of literature who have aimed their weapons at the woman whose only fault would seem to be that she has outlived her husband? They have denounced her, slandered her, ridiculed her and affected to despise her but the paper bullets of these brainless marksmen have failed to dislodge her from the abiding affection of the ordinary man. Perhaps, like Tony Weller, the writers have feared the widow. Perhaps—but I have too much respect for the cloth of her husband's coat to insinuate that Mrs. Hillis fears the widows too. And yet fear has been at the bottom of all the persecution to which the widow has been subjected. The widow has been married; that is to say, she has studied man at close range. She has seen him when the mask he wears before the world is off. She has compared the promise of the suitor with the fulfilment of the husband. Now that he is dead she looks at other men with a dangerous serenity of feature which seems to say, "I understand you." She has sailed forth upon the sea of matrimony under convoy and has returned to port alone. Whether her voyage has been calm or stormy no one knows.

Some Spiteful Writers

Fearing the widow the writer has seen fit to satirize her. It is the usual resort of the cowardly. Witness Petronius with his mischievous story of the widow of Ephesus. Witness the commentators of Petronius who have maintained that the story is as old as the pyramids and that the widow was the widow of Pharaoh. Witness Shakespeare who will have it that the widow weeps for her departed lord but a paltry hour and a quarter and who, as if to prove that Benedick spoke truth, shows the Lady Anne halting beside the bier on its way to the tomb to give the promise of her hand to Richard III. Witness, too, Hamlet's mother who hurried from weeds to orange blossoms in the same indecorous fashion. "A daughter of Eve, such was the widow Wadman, and 'tis all the character I intend to give her," says Sterne and proceeds in his sly equivocal way to take her character away from her. And Sterne was a clergyman to whom was divinely commended the care of the widows and the orphans! And so on through the literary calendar. Fear certainly breathes in such utterances; perhaps selfishness also. The prospect of having a widow of his own does not appeal to your man of letters for it involves the unpleasant necessity of dying first.

A Reason Hinted At

Despite the harsh sayings of the authors and the mean fling of Mrs. Hillis I am willing to predict that the widow will flourish as of yore. Husbands are still dying and leaving spouses behind them; still stepping out of matrimony and leaving their former helpmates with or without alimony. Why should not the widow wipe the tears from her rosy cheek and put aside black chiffon for white tulle? She has the charm of mature womanhood and knows how to exhibit it to advantage. Also she knows the weak points of the male animal and can humor him to the top of his bent if she desires to make a conquest. That is why a clever woman will widow two or three men and win a fourth husband with ease while many a girl must spinster it to the end of her days.. Can it be that Mrs. Hillis is blessed with a bevy of marriageable daughters?

Two Fleets For the Pacific

The purport of a recent order made by Secretary of the Navy Meyer is to give the Pacific Ocean two battleship fleets instead of one. They will be known as the Pacific fleet and the Asiatic fleet. Rear-Admiral John Hubbard will be in command of the Asiatic fleet and Rear-Admiral Harber will relieve Rear-Admiral Sebree of the command of the newly organized Pacific fleet. The present third squadron of the Pacific fleet will be known as the Asiatic fleet while the Pacific fleet will consist of the present first and second divisions. The present third division of the Pacific fleet, consisting of the Milwaukee and St. Louis, has been detached and the vessels will continue in reserve. The smaller vessels on duty in Central American waters will not be considered as attached to either fleet. The Denver and the Galveston have been detached from the Pacific fleet and they will proceed in company from Cavite to the west coast, and thence to their home yards, the Denver to Mare Island and the Galveston to Bremerton.

The Christian Science Position

The following letter has been called forth by a recent paragraph in which I spoke of a seeming contradiction in the teachings of Mrs. Eddy to which a correspondent had called my attention: January 15, 1910; To the Editor of Town Talk, San Francisco, Cal. Dear Sir: Referring to your issue of the 8th where it is asked, "How can physicians who apply medicine and surgery to the healing of ills be reputable physicians in the eyes of Christian Science?" I would say that such a question presupposes an antagonism on the part of Christian Scientists which does not exist. There is hardly a Christian Scientist who does not number among his intimate friends either physicians or those who are in sympathy with their methods of treatment. Such friends are respected, and the fact that they believe in the use of material remedies does not prevent a recognition of their sterling qualities. The physician who believes in material laws is consistent when he employs material prescriptions, and if he gives his patients that treatment for which they have asked and in which he conscientiously believes, he is not a "quack" but has honestly earned his fees. Speaking of such physicians Mrs. Eddy writes: "It is just to say that generally the cultured class of medical practitioners are grand men and women, ..." (Science and Health, page 164). In regard to the lines written by Mrs. Eddy in recognition of the New Year, it is needless to speculate as to what place they will be accorded by literary critics. There is this to be noted, that each successive year the writings of this illustrious woman are increasingly sought and studied. Thanking you for giving space to these comments, yours sincerely, Olcott Haskell.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—From the day of the Morgan and Taft conferences at Washington directly after January 1, the stock market has been sagging under the pressure of liquidation coming undoubtedly from important sources. As a result the market in the late days of this week has become water-logged with stock and there has been a sharp break. It would appear that any plans of banking interests for maintaining prices had been upset by the character of legislation pending at Washington, hence the logical result, that heavy selling by banking syndicates occurred. It is a fact that dividends were to be increased on many leading issues of securities in the coming sixty days which would have been a strong incentive for higher values later but these plans, we can say authoritatively, have been abandoned. As we view the market at the close of this week we should say that the present decline had gone far enough and that improvement should now be shown in all leading securities.

Wheat has been set back by the depression that has swept over all markets. Chicago has fallen below the outside market and cash is commanding a premium. There has been considerable complaint the past week by millers that flour trade is slow, but much of this complaint arises from the poor shipping facilities in the snow bound region. The European situation has not improved and prices there are holding more firmly, but still out of line with this side. Argentina's small shipments reflect both the small crop and the late harvest, and improvement will follow, but average shipments will be below last year. The wheat market is purely domestic and with a bearish attitude on the part of the millers a lower level is apt to be made; around 110 for May a good support will develop. It will be several weeks before the acuteness of domestic supplies will become apparent and lead to a strong market.
